This book would not have been possible without the hard work of the contributors. For most of them, their work began with the presentation of papers at the “Confidentiality & Society” conference in Montreal in October 2000. Our contributors proved to be unfailing in their efforts, often in the face of numerous suggestions for revisions and last minute requests during the editorial process. We would like to thank them for their commitment to issues of confidentiality and to this project.

We are grateful to Carleton University and, in particular, Aviva Freedman, Dean of Arts and Social Sciences, and Jay Drydyk, Chair of Department of Philosophy, for awarding a grant toward the cost of the editorial work. We would also like to thank the Quebec English Branch of the Canadian Psychoanalytic Society and the Canadian Psychoanalytic Society for their support, both financial and moral.

A number of people were involved in preparing the manuscript. Lorraine Kirschner and Jodi Jacoby could be counted on for advice about the mysteries of Word and various Editors at Rodopi have been particularly helpful in the tasks related to production. A special thanks goes to Richard Hull, who prepared the manuscript and the index. Richard worked with a tight schedule and made the pressure filled final stages of preparing the manuscript manageable. It was a pleasure to work with him. We would also like to thank our Series Editor, Jon Mills. His support of this project from the very early stages of its conception made all the difference to our goal of maintaining high standards.

Last, but far from least, all three editors express heartfelt gratitude to their respective spouses who have been exceptionally patient about the time and attention required for this endeavor.

We hope that psychoanalysts, psychotherapists, social workers, philosophers, ethicists, legal theorists, lawyers, and the general public will find the book useful in the theoretical and practical work they do on confidentiality and for the confidential relationships they are in.
