As always with any major undertaking, there are friends and colleagues to thank. The research work for the project was generously supported by a Wellcome Trust Research Fellowship in the History of Medicine, held at the Wellcome Institute in London, where Vivian Nutton offered encouragement and valued criticism. I also benefited from the financial support of the British Academy in the course of my preliminary investigations.

I am not an archaeologist, and Gill Clark patiently guided me to possible sources of information. I hope that my efforts meet with her approval; any errors remain firmly my own. Drafts of individual chapters were read by Chris Wickham and Monica Green, and I am grateful for their insights. The idea for the study developed from a paper given at Birmingham University’s postgraduate medieval seminar, and subsequent chapters were read at the Early Medieval History seminar at the Institute of Historical Research in London; the Accordia Research Seminar at the Institute of Archaeology; the History of Science and Medicine seminar at the Wellcome Institute; and at the second International Medieval Congress at Leeds. I received many fruitful lines of enquiry to follow up at all four meetings and extend warm thanks to all concerned. That the project has finally appeared in print is due wholly to the initial encouragement of David Abulafia and to the efforts of Julian Deahl and the staff at Brill.

Michael Brooks and Irene Skinner have frequently helped me in my pursuit of the sick of medieval southern Italy, offering assistance and acute suggestions as the manuscript took shape: they remain my most valued critics.