PREFACE

This work is a revision of my doctoral dissertation submitted to the faculty of Fuller Theological Seminary’s Center for Advanced Theological Studies in 1993. Like all projects of this nature, one’s indebtedness is enormous. I would especially like to thank Richard Muller, who served as my mentor Professor at Fuller, and first introduced me to Samuel Clarke. In addition I wish to express my appreciation to Colin Brown, Nancey Murphy, and Jim Bradley, all of whom read various chapters and gave insightful comments. Likewise, I would like to thank Richard Popkin, who served as the external reader.

This work utilizes a number of microfilm manuscripts, particularly in regard to Isaac Newton’s theology. These were made available through the assistance of the King’s College Library at Cambridge University, the National Jewish and University Library in Jerusalem, and the Clark Memorial Library (UCLA). In addition, Richard Westfall not only helped me secure other Newton manuscripts, but helped me sharpen and develop my line of approach on Newton’s thought.

Other research institutions which supported my work, and to whom I am grateful, are the Huntington Library in San Marino, California, the University of California at Los Angeles and Irvine, Fuller Theological Seminary, the Claremont-McKenna Colleges, the Claremont School of Theology, the California Institute of Technology and the University of Edinburgh. I would also like to thank E. Dorothy Asch, who has allowed me to use her unpublished dissertation on Samuel Clarke as a source for my research.

On a personal level, I wish to express my thanks to members of the Westminster Presbyterian Church in Oklahoma City, who encouraged me from the beginning, particularly Mr. and Mrs. John Frank. Also I would like to thank the Session and members of Arcadia Presbyterian Church, who allowed me to use my study leaves while serving on their staff to work on this monograph.

Finally, I would like to express my gratitude to Professor Heiko A. Oberman, first, for his own scholarship which was of great benefit to me in my doctoral study, and now especially for his generous acceptance of this work into his series, Studies in the History of Christian Thought.
