ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

It was during my years as a doctoral student that I first turned my attention to the cache of fifteenth-century chantefable and dramatic texts discovered at Jiading County outside Shanghai in 1967. Liu Ts’un-yan, now Emeritus Professor at the Australian National University, was my doctoral supervisor and constant supporter. I thank him greatly for allowing me to draw on his extraordinary erudition in Chinese civilisation. I also wish to record my gratitude to another of my teachers, Pierre Ryckmans, whose lectures on Chinese literature and art I found inspirational. Rafe de Crespigny, a specialist in the Three Kingdoms era, taught me to interpret the intricacies of Chinese historiography and gave me great encouragement.

Subsequent to my doctoral study, I have benefited from many Chinese scholars who have shared their time and experience with me. Zhao Jingshen, who was the first scholar to introduce the discovery of the Ming Chenghua period chantefables to the world of scholarship, discussed the texts with me in 1979 during my studies as an exchange student at Fudan University. With a grant from the Australian Academy of Humanities in 1986 I was able to visit the village where the chantefables were excavated and interview leading villagers. I am particularly grateful to Mr Liu Gang from the Shanghai branch of the Chinese Academy of Social Sciences, Ms Chu Yong, custodian of the Jiading Region Museum and others at the Shanghai Museum who allowed me to view the original chantefable texts.

A term as Visiting Scholar at the John King Fairbank Center at Harvard University in 1987 with financial assistance from the American Association of University Women provided the time and opportunity to collect data for this project. Patrick Hanan introduced me to his postgraduate students and provided advice on the location of rare material. While in Boston I benefited much from the comments of Patrick Hanan, Wilt Idema (visiting from the University of Leiden) and James Watson (visiting from the University of Pittsburgh). I would also like to thank the chief Librarian at the Harvard-Yenching Library, Eugene Wu, for assistance in obtaining rare microfilms and to members of the Fairbank Center for stimulating luncheons and seminars, particularly, Joanna Handlin Smith, Peter Bol, Rudolph Wagner, Ellen Widmer, Nancy Hodes, Valerie Hanson, Lisa Raphaels, Judith Zeitlin and Cynthia Brokaw.

On field trips to China during the 1990s I have been privileged to discuss my work with members of the association for the study of The Three Kingdoms Narrative, particularly Tan Luofei and Tan Liangxiao. Chen Xianghua, of the Beijing Library, the author of many studies on vernacular fiction, has been a regular correspondent and kindly arranged for me to view rare books at the Beijing Library. Through his good offices I was honoured to meet the veteran scholar, Wu Xiaoling, in his home in Beijing. Zhou Zhaoxin, of Beijing University, provided great encouragement for my interest in the Narrative of the Three Kingdoms.
ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

In 1994, on a visit to London, I sought advice from Andrew Lo and Alison Bailey of the School of Oriental and African Studies, London University. I am grateful to both, particularly Alison Bailey for her warm hospitality, which made my stay in London so enjoyable. Whilst in London I was able to view rare Ming editions in the Indian and Oriental Office of the London Library.

The revival of Chinese traditional oral and ritual arts post 1978 was an important stimulus to the changing direction of my research, which increasingly came to centre on the interaction between oral and literate cultures and the social context of Chinese vernacular publishing. During four field-trips to the lower Yangtze delta from 1991-1994 I had the good fortune to seek advice from Chen Qinjian of East China Normal University, Shanghai, who has greatly enriched my knowledge of Chinese popular culture, particularly the ritual arts of Chinese women in Nanhui and Jiading counties. I have also learned much from the work of Lucille Chia, University of California, Davis, who has sent me prepublication copies of her valuable work on Fujian publishing. Cynthia Brokaw of the University of Oregon has been another regular correspondent. She has kept me informed about her own archival work in Fujian and put me in touch with the circle of scholars around the world interested in early vernacular print. I thank her for her interest and encouragement. On a visit to Melbourne in 1997, Wang Ch'iu-kuei pointed out the rich holdings of the ritual theatre project under his direction and the link between nuo theatricals and chantefables.

I am indebted to the Australia-China University Links Program, the Australian Research Council, which gave me a three-year Large Grant, and the La Trobe University Vice-Chancellor's China Fund which provided funding for my field-trips to China. I am also grateful to Liz Day, of the English Department, University of Melbourne, who edited the complete draft with considerable patience. A reader of E.J.Brill suggested many improvements and kindly sent extra material.

My husband, Lawrence Dooley, and daughter, Laura, have offered constant support during the long gestation of this book. At times they have followed me around the world, at other times they have borne my absences overseas. I am deeply grateful for their patience and love.