ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

The writing of every book, it is said, is a journey. Although some journeys are short and direct, others are long and circuitous. This one has certainly been the latter. Since writing the original dissertation upon which this book is based, the process of expansion, revision, and reorganization has been interrupted many times for reasons that most young scholars will readily recognize and probably empathize with: emotionally draining job searches, the considerable shifting of mental gears that inevitably accompanies the transition from graduate school to the demanding first years of teaching and professional responsibility, and the simple unfolding of the life cycle (the birth of a son, the death of a father). Despite the sense of frustration which frequently accompanied delay, I hope that greater intellectual maturity and more profound insight are reflected in the final product. Whether or not this is true, others must judge.

No book is solely the product of one person, and my debts to others are indeed great. Orest Ranum, Frank Knight, George Krotkoff, Richard Kagan, and especially Philip Curtin first excited me about the study of history as an undergraduate at Johns Hopkins and they set me on the path to what has since become both my profession and an abiding passion. Later, as a graduate student at Princeton, I accumulated many more debts. First, I would like to thank Avrom Udovitch, who was so much more than my adviser. He was a wonderful and inspiring guide in the important intellectual journey that led me, like so many of my peers, to explore new approaches in medieval Islamic social and cultural history. A fortuitous encounter with Peter Brown first convinced me that an inquiry into the veneration of medieval Muslim saints was an important and needed project. His continuing interest, support, and encouragement over the years have been both generous and profoundly important in shaping my historical imagination. In addition, I wish to thank my other mentors at Princeton for all their kindness and support, particularly: L. Carl Brown, Mark Cohen, Michael Cook, Charles Issawi, Norman Itzkowitz, Bernard Lewis, and Hossein Modarressi. My colleagues in graduate school, Jonathan Berkey, Remie Constable, Jonathan Katz, and Amy Singer, each offered valuable criticism in the early stages of my research. Jonathan Berkey has continued to share with me the benefit of his perceptive insights into medieval Egyptian history and has consistently been the best and most reliable of friends.

Many colleagues at the American University in Cairo and at Cairo University offered invaluable advice and help while I was conducting research in Egypt. At AUC I would particularly like to mention John Swanson, George Scanlon, Bernard O’Kane, Tarek Swelim, and Laila Ali Ibrahim. Muḥammad Muḥammad Amīn and Muḥammad Hassanein Rabie of Cairo University were both wonderful teachers and later reliable advisers.

While writing this book many people have offered me the benefit of their wisdom, advise, and criticism. Yusuf Rāghib became a good friend, and I am enormously indebted to him for both his many references and thoughtful criticism. No scholar knows this source material better than Yusuf, and I have clearly benefited greatly from his many detailed topographic studies of al-Qarāfa. Bernard O’Kane, Lucette Valensi, and Carl Petry offered many important suggestions right up to the point where the final manuscript went to press. Emil Homerin and Donald Little carefully read and commented extensively on the penultimate version of the book. Thanks to their sharp and critical eyes a number of errors were avoided and some important additions were made. The editors of this series, Professors Ulrich Haarmann and Wadad Kadi were invaluable. Not only did they have faith in this project but they also identified several key structural changes which have immeasurably strengthened the final work. I would also like to express my thanks to the staff at EJ. Brill, particularly Peri Bearman, who was very kind before her departure from Brill. Jan Fehrmann, Trudy Kamperveen, and Julie Plokker have been most patient and reassuring throughout the final production process. At a critical moment Margaret Case came to my rescue and made time in her busy schedule to edit the final manuscript. Without her keen insight, venerable editorial skill, and sharp pen, this book would not be what it is.

To my colleagues in the Religious Studies Department at Drew University, Bill Stroker, Don Jones, Peter Ochs (now at the University of Virginia), and Karen Prentiss I am also indebted. It is impossible for me to imagine more supportive colleagues. I am truly honored and blessed by their collegiality as well as by their friendship. The administration at Drew, especially Deans Paolo Cucchi and Barbara Salmore, could not have been more helpful or encouraging. My students in Religion 36 and 46 have made this book richer through the many insights prompted by their thoughtful questions.

I would also like to acknowledge the generous financial support of the Princeton University Graduate School. The Dean's Council at Drew also provided financial assistance in the final writing of this book. U.S. Government funding was essential both in supporting my graduate studies and through a USIA-funded research grant administered by the American Research Center in Egypt. I deeply regret that such federal support seems increasingly limited.

To my family, of course, I owe the greatest debts of all. I thank my parents and my brothers for all of their emotional support and love. I would especially like to acknowledge my mother, Lydia Schurman, who made many more sacrifices in her own professional and scholarly life through the years than she should have to ensure that I received the best education possible. Her love, emotional support, and encouragement have been both unfailing and inspiring. My parents-in-law, William Shafik Ghaly and Hanna Fahmy, have been the most gracious and loving hosts during my many visits to Cairo. Finally, my wife Magda and my son Silas have been ceaseless in their support and devotion; even in those frequent moments when, like most writers, I was not the most lovable of people. Silas has sometimes had to muster more patience for a preoccupied father than a four-year old should have to. Maggy has been unfailing in her advice, devotion, and reassurance. She has repeatedly read this manuscript and has made countless corrections and suggestions for improvement. To her this book is lovingly dedicated as the smallest token of my lasting appreciation and deepest affection.
