Many people contributed to this study. Among the most deserving of thanks are: Robert Ginsberg, a saint of patience and clarity whose faithful red pen worked wonders, and whose commitment to this project was remarkable; the other helpful souls at Rodopi and VIBS, especially Eric van Broekhuizen and Richard T. Hull; William L. Reese, who tried to teach me that “less is more,” and who read aloud with me large parts of the earlier version of this manuscript, which had its birth as the dissertation I wrote under his direction; Robert Garvin, who hired me as Research Assistant for a project on personhood while I was a graduate student; Caroline Whitbeck, who had the good sense to get out of Albany in time, but who was always missed; Bonnie Steinbock, who several times suggested to me that I ought to take up something that made more money; the physicians in Family Practice at Dr. Alice Fruehan’s out-patient center; and the patients whose doctors were residents in training. I also owe thanks to my former Philosophy Department at Union College, especially to Robert Baker and Jan Ludwig, who hired me for part-time work when my children and my career were very young; to Felmon Davis, who attended my dissertation defense and compared notes with me from his own doctoral work on “Das Ich” in Jürgen Habermas; to Cheryl Hughes, who reminded me to read Emmanuel Levinas and Paul Ricoeur; to Tristram Engelhardt, who provided cogent critique; to several unknown reviewers; to the medical students and faculty in the Department of Obstetrics and Gynecology and the Department of Psychiatry at the Albany Medical Center for enabling me to serve as a Group Leader of the Human Sexuality component of the Human Development course, teaching medical students from 1978 to 1980, participating in lectures, and leading discussions and exercises, and for their technically and morally excellent training sessions in which I participated fully with other faculty; and most of all to my students, who asked interesting questions and who talked about what personhood means to them. Members of the Eastern and Midwest Divisions of the Society for Women in Philosophy mentored me through difficult times in our profession. The necessary statistical consultation for this project was performed by educational psychologist Robert Pruzek of the State University of New York at Albany. Sandra Peterson-Hardt of Russell Sage College also commented on the data and encouraged my work. I was fortunate to have had two able and careful research assistants: Elise Rottman, and Lisa Pennington, who created professional graphics. David R. Roach provided technical assistance. Thanks also to Ron Waite for preparing the camera-ready manuscript for Rodopi.

Although they are now too old to admit it, my sons Justin and Noah were patient during early phases of this project, when interviews made bedtime routines shorter. Work, study, and single parenting made me so tired that I even fell asleep reading C. S. Lewis's stories to them. They good-naturedly awoke me with their laughing as they joked with each other from top to bottom bunk, predicting what would happen next. I thank them for their joyful, loving help, and for taking excellent care of themselves and each other. My birth family has continued to be my first and best community of support.
