ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

This study grew out of my work on Life in the Ancient Near East, a social and economic history, and the institutions that supported me in that endeavor must be thanked also in this one, particularly the University of Oklahoma in its Senior Faculty Summer Fellowship program, now discontinued, and its sabbatical leave program. A National Endowment for the Humanities Summer Seminar in 1993 under Prof. Philip Curtin at Johns Hopkins University stimulated my thinking on this topic, and to Prof. Curtin and my colleagues in the seminar I owe a debt of gratitude for bibliography and encouragement. In particular Rosemary Brana-Shute of the College of Charleston was helpful in asking invigorating questions.

The Oregon Humanities Center at the University of Oregon in Eugene awarded me a summer fellowship in the summer of 1996 which proved extremely helpful in my delving into bibliography and in beginning to write. The Institute for Advanced Studies in the Humanities at the University of Edinburgh offered me a non-stipendiary fellowship for part of the summer of 1997 which allowed me to complete the preliminary draft. The staff of Otterbein College was very helpful to me in the final stages of the work. Professors Benjamin Foster, David Geggus, Alan Kimball, Mario Liverani, Richard Lowitt, Helga Madland, Paul Minnis, Robert Nye, and Jamil Ragep gave me helpful references and technical advice. My graduate student Lance Allred read the manuscript and gave me several valuable suggestions. We cannot blame him for errors, though, can we?

My family has been supportive of my work and my wanderings, preferring when possible to come along, and the adventures they have had are their own reward. In particular Dr. Katie Barwick-Snell slogged through all this with me. But because of the implications of the study for the future that they will inherit, I dedicate the work to my children, James and Abigail, and to the children of the world.
