ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

It would have been impossible for me to reach and research the Lisu of northern Thailand without the support of several institutions. The first to grant me permission to stay in an area, near the Burmese border, was the National Research Council of Thailand. I wish to thank the Council for paving the way to the Lisu village in the province of Chiang Rai, in such a smooth administrative manner. That many trips to the mountains of Thailand could materialize, was due to the interest taken by the Netherlands Foundation for the Study of South East Asian Mountain Peoples, Utrecht; an interest which has been genuine and continuous. I am grateful for their stimulating sponsorship and financial support. To the founding father of the Foundation, Dr. Lieuwe Hornstra, I want to specifically express my warmest appreciation for creating this brain-child. As a good Lisu daughter would do, I herewith present this book to him, the symbolic vegetables that I gathered from the field, “while father is on the look-out”.

Among my Thai colleagues, who cooperated so readily, I would like to mention Achaan Shalardchai Ramitanondh and Achaan Suthep Soonthornpasuch, both of Chiang Mai University. Khun Prasert Chaipigusit, the expert on the Lisu at the Tribal Research Institute of Chiang Mai, generously shared his intimate knowledge and gave me many hints, for which I am grateful.

Among my friends and fellow-workers in the field to whom thankful acknowledgements are due I want to single out Leo Alting von Geusau for conscientizing my mind to the plight of the mountain people and Nina Kammerer who wrote eye-opening and extensive comments on the draft of my manuscript during the hottest month of Chiang Mai. I also wish to say thanks to John Cadet, writer and lecturer at Payap University for pointing out inconsistencies in style and unseemly figures of speech.

The linguists Inga Lill Hansson and David Bradley helped me understand the intricacies of Loloish languages with their explications on comparison, syntax and transcription.

My long-time travelling companion Michael Vickery, provided intellectual food for thought with his provocative questions on many occasions when we walked the trails leading to my Lisu hut. He created a supportive ambiance in his flat “down under”, while I was reflecting on my fieldwork experiences, and straightened out much of my English verbiage.

With feelings as strong as the seven souls of a woman, I want to show my gratitude to my kith and kin of the Lisu village See-the-Tiger, and other villages as well for their willingness to take me into their midst.

Although the Lisu do not appreciate the idea of favouring one family member over another, I nevertheless want it be known that special recognition is given to Alema Sae Tsuang, Awu Saemi, Niwat Tami and Panna Tami for tell-teaching me the Lisu way of acting, speech and song.
