ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

This book has taken shape over a number of years and across many thousands of miles, and it is a pleasure at last to have this opportunity to acknowledge by name some of the many and widespread individuals and institutions whose assistance has been gratefully received. At the very core of this study is the extensive research and photography done at museums and sites in India, particularly in Gujarat and Rajasthan. To the directors and curators of museums who permitted me to study sculptures in their storage areas and who graciously suffered the disruption of their normal routines to enable me to photograph objects in their galleries, I owe great thanks. S. K. Bhowmik and Madhav Gandhi of the Baroda Museum and R.C. Agrawala of the Rajasthan Department of Museums were especially generous. So too were the directors and staff of the archaeology departments who granted permission to photograph protected monuments, do research in their archives, and kindly extended many other courtesies to facilitate my work. My special thanks in this regard go to the Archaeological Survey of India in New Delhi, to its Baroda office, to the Rajasthan department under R. C. Agrawala and to the Gujarat department directed by J. M. Nanavati. To the directors and staff at the National Museum, the Bharat Kala Bhavan, the Pratap Singh Museum in Srinagar, the Gwalior, Lucknow and Mathura Museums, and to those in charge of collections at M.S. University in Baroda, I also extend my appreciation for the opportunity to photograph objects under their direction.

During my residence in Baroda, I had the good fortune of being able to ask many questions of R. N. Mehta, my official guide, whose helpful advice on a wide variety of matters was much appreciated. So too was the scholarly counsel and cordial hospitality extended by U. P. Shah. My thanks also go to other unofficial guides, Anand Krishna and Ratan Parimoo. The help of Manibhai Vora and Narottam Palan in Porbander is gratefully remembered as is the sustaining warmth and hospitality of the Desai and Kulshreshtha households. With unfailing humor and good counsel their friendship eased an often nomadic existence for us.

Many others have been more than generous in a number of ways. My debt to Michael Meister, Walter Spink and Joanna Williams for sharing unpublished manuscripts becomes abundantly clear throughout the text. Less evident there is Carol Bolon’s timely assistance with numerous citations and study photographs in the final preparation of the manuscript. My thanks are also due Miriam Levin and Susan Huntington for reading sections of the final draft and to Sara Upton for her flawless typing of it. The resourcefulness of Susan and John Huntington in making maps, providing plans and a caravanserai complete with library between Amherst and Chicago is cheerfully remembered. In addition to the assistance of the American Institute of Indian Studies and those museums acknowledged elsewhere, I wish to thank a number of individuals for responding to requests for photographs: Carol Bolon, John and Susan Huntington, Michael Meister, Walter Spink, Joanna Williams, Michael Willis and Holly Hutchens. Sadashiv Gorakshakar, Director of the Prince of Wales Museum, kindly supplied a number of photographs on rather short notice.
XVIII  ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

Research on this project was made possible first by a Freer Research Fellowship from the Department of the History of Art at the University of Michigan followed by a 1975-76 Junior Fellowship from the American Institute of Indian Studies for fieldwork in India. I am particularly grateful for the support given by the Director and staff of the A.I.I.S. office in New Delhi and by the Directors of the Institute’s superb research facilities in Varanasi. An award from the University of Michigan Rackham School of Graduate Studies facilitated the completion of the dissertation phase of this study as did the assistance given by the Art Institute of Chicago. My special thanks to the Director of the School of the Art Institute, Donald Irving, for his support. I must add my thanks to the National Endowment for the Humanities for its 1982 Summer Stipend which funded a return trip to India allowing me to do further work on mātrīkā iconography and to take additional photographs for this book.

I am especially indebted to the Millard Meiss Fund committee of the College Art Association and to its chairman, the late H. W. Janson, for the generous subvention awarded me and to Mary Catherine Bateson, Dean of Faculty at Amherst College, for the timely grant of research funds and an additional subvention. Without their support, this publication would not have been possible.

Nor could this book have been completed without the excellent library resources in Ann Arbor and Chicago, collections made more valuable by the enthusiastic help of those who tracked down the uncatalogued volumes and answered the occasional long-distance query: to Maureen Patterson, South Asia Bibliographer at the University of Chicago who knows not only South Asian civilizations but every corner of Regenstein 5, my special thanks and appreciation. The reference and technical services staffs of the Ryerson Library at the Art Institute of Chicago have similarly earned my gratitude.

In addition, I am pleased to acknowledge the helpful assistance I have received from the publishers of this book, E. J. Brill, especially Dr. F. Th. Dijkema, whose thoughtful attention to detail has been of great value. In addition, I consider myself fortunate indeed to have worked with the editor of this series, Prof. Dr. J. E. van Lohuizen-de Leeuw, whose generous guidance has extended beyond editorial concerns into matters of scholarly substance. My thanks are due her for the careful reading of my manuscript and for the suggestions which I have gratefully incorporated. I deeply regret her untimely death.

The manuscript of this book was substantially finished in May 1982 and therefore includes few references to any to coincident or subsequent publications.

Harder to acknowledge is my appreciation to those whose continuous interest and support have helped shape this work and whose many contributions defy easy categorization. Thanks are hardly enough to Walter Spink for years of patience, interest and critical questioning throughout my graduate study in Ann Arbor and for a shared enthusiasm translated into unstinting support and encouragement. Last but by no means least, I record more than thanks to my husband, Horst Schastok, who spent fifteen months in India taking photographs and processing films with characteristic calm and ingenuity and who has spent far more arduous years living with the writing of this study. To honor his enthusiasm for my work and his own interest in the people and places of India, I dedicate this book to Horst.
