ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

This book has its own history. It all started when the Indonesia Canada Islamic Higher Education Project—a program that, through the cooperation of people in both countries has, among other things, offered many young Indonesian scholars the chance to improve their academic qualifications—decided to offer me a scholarship to study at the Institute of Islamic Studies, McGill University, Montreal. There, particularly in its library, I spent some of the best years in my life. There I also met my new Indonesian friends, to whom I would turn when homesick for Indonesia. To them I would turn as well on moving days, when I had so many boxes of books to be carried!

While the UIN (Universitas Islam Negeri, State Islamic University) Syarif Hidayatullah Jakarta kindly allowed me to leave my duties there to pursue my research, Professor Donald P. Little, during the period of my study at the Institute, kindly opened my eyes wider and gave more life to my imagination. He is also the one who kept encouraging me to publish this work. Knowing that I was quite hesitant to do so, he shared with me a piece of advice that his own supervisor, the late Gustave von Grunebaum, gave him: “Don’t be afraid of publishing your work just because you think that people will criticize you. Look, what happened to Jesus!” Come what may!

Luckily for me, Prof. Wadad Kadi, gave me a foretaste of this criticism, and at an opportune moment. She kindly read the whole manuscript, showed me the drawbacks of the study, and nonetheless demonstrated her interest in publishing it in the IHC series. I derived much benefit from her comments and suggestions. Ms. Trudy Kamperveen of Brill has also been extremely helpful and patient in assisting me in this project.

I visited Ben Anderson a couple of times at his home in Ithaca. While my original intention was actually to ask questions concerning his Imagined Communities, he also led me somewhere else: to the farms where we walked one afternoon, to issues of history, and finally to his sister and brother Melanie and Perry in London, whose home became my asylum during my research there, and who likewise played a role in the making of this book. Etan Kohlberg was kind enough to lend me a copy of his dissertation. And if my readers find before them a fluent English text, it is due to the patient labor of my friend Steve Millier, who edited this work and provided much sound advice on style and technical matters.

There are of course still many people, here and there, who worked tirelessly on my behalf and were always ready to assist me on every occasion. For reasons of space let me acknowledge here my indebtedness to all of them.

But, nonetheless, I will never forget this: my cheerful sons Ausaf, Owej, Rayhan and their mother, my beloved Ayang, in their own way, make this life so beautiful.

And yet, despite the contributions of so many people to this project, any shortcomings in the work are my responsibility and mine alone.
