Research for this monograph was made possible in part by various grants. I am grateful to the Andrew W. Mellon Foundation Trust and the Appalachian College Association for fellowships I received in 1997 and 1998, to the Catholic Biblical Association for the CBA Young Scholar’s Fellowship I received in 1995, and to Lees-McRae College for providing travel money to professional conferences.

To my colleagues in the Humanities Division at Lees-McRae College I am greatly indebted for many illuminating comments and debates. I particularly benefited from frequent exchanges of ideas with Rachel McClure, whose insightful questions and many conversations have taught me more about theology than I learned in graduate school, and also with Michael Vines and Alison Gulley, whose ostensibly different research interests more than once proved relevant to mine. I should also like to single out John Keener, chair of our division, and Jim Watts, at Syracuse University. Both read my work in the face of a recalcitrant subject and an equally recalcitrant manuscript. They have helped me more than I can say. Correspondence and conversation with Jack Sasson (Vanderbilt Divinity School) and Phyllis Trible (Wake Forest University Divinity School) proved helpful at an early stage. I should also like to thank Dwaine Greene (Campbell University), Burke Long (Bowdoin College), Robert Polzin (Carleton University), and Evelyn Thibeaux (Georgetown University) for their interest and comments on early chapter drafts. For the weakness and imperfections that remain I am responsible. Another group of readers, who are every bit as important as the preceding but who must here remain an anonymous band, are the many Lees-McRae College students who over the past several years have studied with me the texts explored herein. They revealed in their unencumbered readings unexpected facets of texts I had turned over in my mind many times before.

Research would not have been possible without two libraries and their keepers, at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill and at Lees-McRae College. Patti Bowers, Faye Williams, and Ramona Hayes at the latter were always helpful and efficient when I needed assistance. The software developers and support staff at Nota Bene also helped by simplifying the task of writing. The greatest source of support has come from my wife, Niki, and our children, Alexandra and Luke, for they give my life meaning.

Most translations of scripture are my own. On occasion, I follow the New Revised Standard Version.
