ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

It would be impossible to give a comprehensive account of all those scholars whose interest and encouragement led to the presentation of this volume. My interest in this project began many years ago when just prior to his death, Denis Bethel, Secretary to the Board of Medieval Studies at University College Dublin, handed a visiting student his own copy of A.G. Little’s Roger Bacon Essays. Many thanks are due to faculty and students at Dublin and Toronto in the areas of Philosophy and Medieval Studies. The initial work in Medieval Studies was done under the direction of Professor F.X. Martin, OSA and Dr. Michael Richter. A debt of gratitude is due also to Professor Bieler and Professor O’Meara for an introduction to Neoplatonism.

My interest in the thought of Roger Bacon owes a great deal to the late James A. Weisheipl O.P. who introduced me to the History of Medieval Science. And acknowledgment of the faculty and students at Toronto is required. James A. Weisheipl was a dedicated researcher and teacher and he above all is to be acknowledged here.

The actual suggestion for the volume came from Professor David C. Lindberg. And a challenge to do it came from a fellow student, William O. Shorten, mathematicus. The editor is also grateful to Professor A.C. Crombie for his encouragement of this project. He wishes to acknowledge Professor A. Hyman and Professor Paul Oskar Kristeller for much encouragement in the research which led to this work. Professor Richard Lemay was generous with advice concerning Abū Ma’shar and Pseudo-Ptolemy’s Centiloquium.

Many thanks are due to his colleagues at the University of South Carolina, and to his family. His colleagues may have thought at times that he had metamorphosed into Roger Bacon, but were kind enough not to say so. His children did say so and forced him to promise that for their pains he would dedicate the volume to them. And that I will do so because I believe that it is important that they learn the truth about the past in so far as we can learn the truth about the past. And unlike cheap mythologies, there is no short-cut to the truth even in the case of one like Roger Bacon, who, on account of Robert Greene’s Friar Bacon and Friar Bungay, among other things, came to be seen as a Magus in Renaissance England.
A special word of thanks is due to the Department of Philosophy and to its Chair, Professor Davis Whitney Baird, who provided funds for the translation work from French in the volume. Thanks are also due to the translator, David C. Miller, M.F.A. In the course of preparing this volume, the editor was greatly helped by the Administrative Assistants in the Department of Philosophy, Ms. Joanna Woodward, and Ms. Joan Spencer-Amado. He wishes to acknowledge the advice and assistance of Ms. Elna Corwin, Mr. Berry Mobley, Mr. Homer R. Steedly Jr. of the College of Liberal Arts computer laboratory, and Mr. Graham Dennis.

Much gratitude is due to Librarians at London, Oxford, Paris, Rome, Dublin, Toronto, and at the University of South Carolina’s Thomas Cooper Library, and the Caroliniana Library. Further, support from the following institutions enabled the research to be undertaken: The American Philosophical Society; The National Endowment for the Humanities; The University of South Carolina Research and Productivity Scholarship; The Pontifical Institute of Mediaeval Studies, Toronto.

Finally, an acknowledgment of four high school teachers "the four horsemen", at Good Counsel, New Ross, a town built by a great man, William Marshall, just before "the times" of Roger Bacon, is in order. They instilled a respect for the Liberal Arts in its full scope. They would have enjoyed meeting Roger Bacon.
