ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

If the general editor of a book were omniscient, he or she would have written the whole book himself or herself. All editors are debtors. First and foremost, I am indebted to the wonderful group of authors that agreed to contribute to this project. It was a learning experience in the best of ways. Just as important is the staff at Brill, and especially Patrick Alexander, the director of Brill in Boston, whose guidance and foresight have been integral to this project.

The book was born out of the fires of teaching a course called “The U.S. Latino/a Religious Experience,” at Iowa State University. My dialogues with students were central to how this book developed in its approach and overall organization. I am a biblical scholar and scholar of religion by training, and still an apprentice in the study of U.S. Latino/a religious traditions. No doubt, I have much to learn in all areas. Jonathan Meier, my acute and meticulous student research assistant, gathered materials and/or proofread parts of this manuscript, especially the chapters that I contributed.

I owe a special debt to my wife, who spent endless hours comforting and assisting a husband, whose face was seemingly embossed on a computer screen for hours on end. Our pet squirrel Rusty provided the antics needed to lighten up some of the longest workdays.

I hereby absolve them all of any transgressions I very likely committed, for I am but human, and certainly not omniscient.
