Preface

The present issue of Danish Yearbook of Philosophy (DYP) is the first one whose theme follows directly from that of a previous annual meeting of the Danish Philosophical Society. In 2019, the society celebrated its twentieth annual meeting in Vejle at University College Lillebaelt, an event hosted by Peter Hertel-Storm. He also serves as the guest editor of the present volume, and in his introduction he presents the theme of the meeting and the articles chosen to illustrate it.

This link between annual meeting and yearbook will be continued in future volumes of DYP; in fact, establishing this link marks the culmination of a success story. Six years ago DYP, after more than fifty years in operation, was on the brink of closing down. There were too few submissions, too few subscribers, no financial support, and too little interest among members of the society. However, despite these gloomy prospects, out of respect for this venerable flagship of Danish philosophy we decided to give it one last try. And fortunately, we succeeded.

Setting our sights on the international market for academic publishing, we managed to obtain a favorable contract for DYP with the prestigious academic publisher Brill in the Netherlands, and with their generous support the yearbook has been growing steadily. Thanks to Brill, the complete run of DYP volumes, beginning in 1964, is now accessible in full text on the DYP homepage (<https://brill.com/view/journals/dyp/dyp-overview.xml>). And according to the new contract just signed, for the first time in its history the yearbook will publish two issues each year. One will be linked to the theme of the annual meeting held two years earlier, while the other will feature articles submitted to DYP and aligning with its overall mission, i.e., to address themes of interest to Danish philosophy. This issue will also include reviews of international books published by authors and editors with strong links to Denmark.

At this fortunate point in DYP's history, Finn Collin, University of Copenhagen and University of Aalborg, has chosen to say goodbye after more than three decades of association with the Yearbook, most of the time as editor-in-chief. As of 2022, the editor-in-chief will be Asger Sørensen, Aarhus University. By assuming this position, however, he leaves a vacancy on the post as managing editor, which we are now in the process of filling. Finally, we are also happy to welcome to the editorial team Mogens Chrom Jacobsen, who as the new review editor has already secured the first book reviews for DYP.

The editors of Danish Yearbook of Philosophy are proud to welcome its readership to this new and exciting phase of the journal's life.
