Abstract

This study introduces and publishes an array of Ottoman archival documents on the shrines of Ahl al-Bayt imams in Iraq, the endowments dedicated to these shrines, and the Shiite-Iranian pilgrims visiting these sites as well as the Kaaba and the shrine of Muhammad in the Hejaz. Focusing on the later seventeenth and the early eighteenth centuries, it discusses the political-economic function of Islamic endowments, inter-confessional contacts resulting from pilgrimage by Shiites in Sunni territory, and the potential use of Ottoman archives to enrich our knowledge on trans-Ottoman themes.

1 Introduction

In the present paper I translate, transcribe, and reproduce a set of Ottoman archival documents on the Imamic shrines of Karbala and Najaf, their endowments, the rivalry between factions at the local, regional, and imperial level to control their funds as well as tenures, their visitation by Shiite Iranians, and likewise the pilgrimage of Shiite Iranians to Mecca and Medina. These writs span the time from the mid-seventeenth century up to the early eighteenth century, while further documents that come from the same archives but are not chosen for publication are also referenced in this study. The introduction, especially the observations and commentary that follow the background setting, thematically prunes out and refines the raw information found in these writs. The contrast between the thematic makeup of the introduction and the blocks of data found in the documents highlights how one can draw out from such sources a set of information that those who created and kept these writs did not have in focus. Therefore this introduction, notwithstanding its length, is not a conventional article laying out, unfolding, and wrapping up an argument, but rather a purposeful extract of the documents, and a case study more generally on the use of Ottoman archival material for new explorations in early modern history.

Taken together, these sources shed new light on how these shrines brought together individuals as well as institutions from the Iraqi countryside, from the provincial governorate at Baghdad, and from the imperial court in a contest for the control of the wealth redistributed through the endowments of these shrines in the form of sinecures. They likewise help us understand in which way the Ottomans oversaw Shiite-Iranian pilgrimage in the Empire, how the Safavid government regarded the shuttling of its subjects between Iran and Sunni Ottoman lands, what these visitations meant for the shrine towns, which regulations thereon came into being between the state and its appointees in provinces, to what extent these subject matters made it into the agenda of political diplomacy, and whether a 'confessionalization' can be seen in these contacts between Shiites and Sunnis.

When taken as a whole, these documents allow us to draw a number of significant inferences. The struggle for the control of Islamic endowments in general lay at the heart of these institutions insomuch that even the endowments for the shrines of the Imams of the House of Muhammad were entangled in the game of appropriating public wealth through lawful means for patrons to fund their clients in political rivalries between factions. These patron-client networks were built-in parts of the Ottoman Empire though, notwithstanding the clash between them, and as they were made up of state bureaus, their branches, and institutional communities, up the ladder each faction ended in one and the same imperial government. The Ottoman state had incorporated the shrine complexes of Ali b. Abi-Talib in Najaf and Husayn b. Ali in Karbala and their income streams into its imperial system as the Endowments of the Two Illustrious Martyria (أوقاف مشهدين شريفيين). These shrines thus became embedded in a network of persons and writs that spanned the axes from Iraq to Hungary and from Anatolia to Arabia, and even stretched out to Egypt and across the border to Iran.

These shrines were popular pilgrimage sites for Muslims from home and abroad, including Shiites from Iran. The documents verify the argument—or rather the guess—advanced by historians that with the peace of 1639 there arose in Ottoman-Safavid relations a kind of territorialization in religious claims laid by these states,¹ though this otherwise-ungrounded assumption comes out right only coincidentally. From the 1640s onward, in Ottoman-Safavid diplomacy and within the Ottoman government in its dealings with Shiite visitors from Iran, the talk of Shiism and Sunnism were neither brought up officially nor hinted at, even if the actors may have been mindful of sectarian disagreements and even when there were local outbreaks of sectarian strife. Besides, Ottoman Sunnism itself revered the saints over whose graves the aforesaid shrines had been raised—Imams of the House of Prophet Muhammad, above all Ali and Husayn—not for the sake of formality but out of its own devotion, though in a way other than that in Shiism. In Mecca, Medina, and on the road to the Hejaz, the Ottoman state ordered its appointees to treat the Iranian, that is Shiite, pilgrims the same as other Muslims, i.e. Sunnis. Although the Shiite-Sunni sectarian strife was by no means settled, Ottoman politicians shut their eyes to it in their contacts with Iran, and went so far as to end the role played by the Empire's Sunni 'ulama' in diplomatic dealings with the Safavids. The parties did not confessionalize their dialogue about the Shiite pilgrims coming from Iran into the Empire.

For administrative processes within the Empire such as petitioning, opening lawsuits, appealing to dignitaries, and enforcing formerly issued writs in such processes, the Ottoman state dealt with Iranian pilgrims as if they were its own subjects. Although it did not identify them as subjects of the Empire, it did not deem them as full aliens either. Iranian pilgrims in the Ottoman Empire were treated as non-subjects to whom the law of subjecthood applied, outside of taxing purposes. These Shiite Iranian pilgrims and the Safavid shahs' gifts to shrines in Ottoman territory became topics of diplomacy only when the two states were cooperating against rebels in the field or holding talks on exceptional Safavid requests for Ottoman permission on sensitive projects. Besides, the inflow of wealth from Iran to the local economies of shrine towns within the Empire was remarkable enough for Ottoman officials to be mindful of the rises and drops in it.

1.1 Background

The “Sublime Thresholds” (عتبات عالیات), i.e. the shrines of Imams from the House of Muhammad in Iraq (Ali b. Abi-Talib in Najaf, Husayn b. Ali in Karbala, Musa al-Kazim b. Jafar as well as Muhammad al-Javad b. Ali in Baghdad’s Kazimiya, and Ali al-Hadi b. Muhammad as well as Hasan al-Askari b. Ali in Samarra) had long been focal points of Islamic ideology, sources of legitimacy, centers of wealth redistribution, and sites of pilgrimage. Abbasid caliphs were the first to construct the buildings that would grow into the later shrine complexes, especially of Ali in Najaf and Husayn in Karbala, and Buyid rulers furthered these early works. Then, the Seljukid and the Ilkhanid monarchies made additions, followed by a rebuilding by Tamerlane. The Safavids and especially the Ottoman state also contributed greatly in infrastructure and renovations. The religious devotion towards, ideological importance of, and the material investment in these shrines had a supra-sectarian character, drawing in the Shiites and the Sunnis alike, notwithstanding the difference between the Shiite and the Sunni understandings on the divinity of the Imams. Therefore, Safavid shah Ismail I’s canal digging project, for example, was picked up and expanded by the Ottoman emperors Suleiman I, Selim II, and Murad III in the sixteenth century. Likewise, in the seventeenth century, the additions made by the Safavid shahs Abbas I and Safi I were furthered under the Ottomans Murad IV, Mehmed IV, and later Ahmad III.²

The Ottoman state took seriously the safety of Ali’s and Husayn’s shrines, and of the pilgrims visiting them. Thus when, for example, a Bedouin uprising befell southern Iraq, it sent separate troops led by a governor from Anatolia to guard Najaf and Karbala only, besides the imperial army already fielded under the command of the governor-general.³ Misdeeds must have happened notwithstanding any policy or measures. But the few occasions when a source left behind a non-native, in disagreement with the more direct and better-informed domestic sources available, claims that the Ottomans oppressed

Iraq's Shiite dwellers or pilgrims coming from Iran,⁴ it should be taken with a grain of salt. Because in these cases, the wrongdoing "Turks" could indeed be some Bedouin tribes rising up against the Empire or against an official acting contrary to the center's behest. Either way, the state recompensed the wronged and retaliated against the wrongdoer in the wake of such cases.⁵ Documents published and cited in the present paper further uphold this reading.

Donations by rulers and dignitaries to the shrines were mostly made from their tax-sourced wealth. The ground on which endowed buildings were constructed was also taken out of the public land. Especially during the period under discussion here, the villages, fees, tolls, businesses, and suchlike, which were endowed as income for the shrines and used among other purposes for assigning the non-service stipends to favored proteges, were likewise written off from the treasury and taxes of the state. Thus, for targeted payments, money was irrevocably allocated from public property and treasury income, instead of being endowed from individuals' private wealth. Islamic law came to acknowledge this kind of write-off as valid, naming them unauthentic endowment (وقف غیر صحیح). So, sinecures dealt out through political favoritism were sourced from the wealth that the Empire as a whole—including both the ruling and the ruled—was to benefit from, rather than out of the pockets of those who made and received these allotments. Already by the mid-sixteenth century this phenomenon had become so widespread in the Empire's Balkan-Anatolian core and its Arab lands that the monarch and the jurists had to tackle the losses to the treasury resulting from these permanent write-offs. Scarcely upheld was the principle of allotting such unauthentic endowments towards expenditures that otherwise had to be undertaken by the state treasury. Most of the public wealth that was endowed thus, as if it were private property, went into the pockets of those living off patronage networks.⁶ The documents examined in the present paper lay bare how the political power drew on endowments to give away state holdings, outwardly in the name of pious charity but indeed for funding gratuitous nepotism—a lawful means of misappropriation that has found application in Muslim polities since the Middle Ages.

In Mecca and Medina, the Ottoman monarch was responsible for ensuring the unhindered fulfillment of the hajj and for keeping the highways on which the pilgrims travelled to the Hejaz open and safe. The Ottoman state owed this to all Muslims notwithstanding what confession they believed in and where they came from. This obligation of course carried a danger, in that an unfriendly foreign polity could easily send in a spy under the guise of a pilgrim. The Empire thus had to balance its obligation on the one hand to enable pilgrimage by foreign subjects, including Shiite Iranians, and on the other to monitor and regulate their activities.⁷ The wardship of Mecca and Medina had much weight in the make-up of Ottoman legitimacy in the imperial period.⁸ Therefore, such side-effects of being the overlord of Islam's holiest land had to be handled with care, without harming the distinction that came along with it. In taking the steps needed to uphold this dignity, manifold letters, orders, reports, and missions shuttled across southeastern Europe and the Middle East; between the state and its appointees, between the Ottoman monarch and the Safavid shah, between the Empire's and Iran's grand viziers, between the borderland governors of the two states and so on. The documents discussed in the present study make up only a small proportion of this archival paper trail.

It is well known that Shah Abbas I had urged his subjects to visit the Imamic shrines within Iran instead of going on pilgrimage to Iraq and Arabia under Ottoman lordship, so as to forestall the outflow of money, and that the Safavids however forsook this policy soon afterwards. Later shahs backed up these westbound trips abroad, and therefore let this undertaking drain considerable amounts of money out of Iran.⁹ The Safavid 'ulama' in fact went so far as to write pilgrimage guidebooks to make Shiite Iranians better "informed of the virtues of visiting the [Sublime] Thresholds" in Ottoman Iraq, and therein heralded that at Judgement Day the Imams would plead for the heavenly salvation of those who had visited these shrines.¹⁰ Iranian grandees even made endowments to finance their proxies (ویکی or نائب) to visit these shrines in their name, while the royal Endowments of the Fourteen Immaculates (موقوفات چهارده معصوم) kept on sending the specified share of its Isfahan-sourced income to those from the offspring of Husayn who dwelt in Medina and were Shiites.

Likewise, there among the outgoings of the Safavids' new Endowments of the Royal Seminary (موقوفات مدرسه سلطانی) was the expenditures for Thresholds and Sanctuaries (عتبات و حرمین), i.e. Najaf, Karbala, Mecca, and Medina.¹¹ The writs studied here also show how embedded the pilgrimage of Shiite Iranians had become in the economies of Imamic shrine towns of Ottoman Iraq by the mid-seventeenth century.

1.2 Observations and Commentary: Political Stakes, Registration, Pilgrims, Diplomacy, and Sectarianism

Documents on the shrines of Karbala and Najaf do not speak of a rivalry between factions, and yet reading between the lines reveals a different picture: appointments to the administration of endowments and grants from endowment income were often motivated less by concerns for public welfare than by factional power struggles—and the endowments for the Imams of the House of Muhammad in Iraq in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries were no exception. The Martyria Endowment was a field of contest between two political networks in the Ottoman Empire.

One of these two networks may be called the governorate faction, for when it held sway, the governor of Baghdad and the treasury of the Baghdad governorate oversaw the Endowment as the link between the Endowment's holdings in the Iraqi countryside and the imperial auditing by the Chief Accountancy Chancery (باش محاسبه قلبی) in Constantinople. The Ottoman governor of Baghdad, installed by the imperial court, named the Endowment's trustee (متولی) and was answerable for the Endowment's financial bookkeeping. Within the other network, which may be called the palatials' faction, the Chief Eunuch of the Imperial Harem (دارالسعاده آغاسی) ran the Endowment as its overseer (ناظر) and hence determined its appointments and allotted its wealth; the Endowment was given exemption and autonomy (مفروز القلم، مقطوع) from the control of the treasury of the Baghdad governorate; and the Lesser Accountancy Chancery of Sanctuary Endowments (کوچک حرمین محاسبه سی قلبی / اوقاف قلبی) took on the auditing at the imperial finance department.¹²

Notwithstanding the posts and titles involved, the contest between these two networks for controlling the Endowment was not one between Baghdad and Constantinople, or between the central government and the province's governorate. This is for several reasons. First, the governor of Baghdad was at the time no less a dignitary of the Imperial Court than the chief eunuch of the palace. These governors too had stemmed from within the palace and imperial service, and even after they had been appointed to so eminent a position as, say, viceroy of Iraq, the future of their political career continued to depend on the Imperial Court. Moreover, as governors of Baghdad they were at the same time non-resident viziers of the Imperial Council. So, even if the province of Baghdad was geographically at the edge of the Empire, the governorate of Baghdad was institutionally no less Ottoman than the monarch's court.

Besides, both under governorate control and the palatials' oversight, the hierarchy to which the Martyria Endowment was subordinated ended up in the grand vizier, which further rules out a center-periphery strife. Between former, incumbent, and potential trustees of the Endowment, a fight to secure the revocation of the investiture of one's rivals and have oneself appointed instead (let us call these charter wars) likewise came down to the grand vizier's edict (بیورولدی)—notwithstanding whether the aghas of the Harem or the pashas of Baghdad oversaw the Endowment.¹³

Instead of being a center-periphery rivalry, therefore, the conflict was rather between two networks that were both within the imperial establishment. Sayyids (the offspring of the House of Muhammad through Ali) who dwelled in Iraq and the officers of the court of the governor himself keenly sided with the governor of Baghdad to hold sway over the Martyria Endowment.¹⁴ As part of the rival faction, the Harem eunuchs and the Halberdiers' Corps (بالطه جیر / تبرداران بیرون همایون) backed up the Chief Eunuch to oversee the Endowment—one should keep in mind that the chief eunuch was already the overseer of the Empire-wide endowments for the Two Sanctuaries, namely the Kaaba in Mecca and Muhammad's shrine in Medina. Much as belonging to a corps, a pasha court, or a lineage carried weight in this strife within the imperial court for the control of the shrines of Ali and Husayn in Iraq, it was not the only determinant. The same strife as the one between these political networks could also break out as infighting among individuals within each of these networks.

What caused a group or individual to side with either the governor of Baghdad or the chief eunuch as candidate to run the Karbala and Najaf Martyria were patron-client ties, informed by considerations of how, where, and to whom the Endowment's resources would be allotted. This network could be so wide and the wealth thus dealt out so great that parties to this relationship could keep on sticking together even after their terms at the Endowment would end. Under governorate control, the governor of Baghdad pocketed the fixed “oversight money (نظارت آچہ سی)” as well as the conventional “courtly fee (قاپو خرجی),” to be shared between himself and his chief of staff (کد خدا). A yearly “chancery fee” (قلمیہ) of handsome amount was also paid from the Endowment’s income to the governor nominating the trustee—be it a local sayyid or a non-local person. The treasurer of Baghdad too collected a further “courtly fee.” Besides, the pasha of Baghdad’s majordomo (وکیل), stand-in (متسلم), retinue officers, welcome officers (خوشآمد آغارلی), sentry officers (قراغول آغارلی), the magistrate (ضابط) of Hilla (a town to the south of Baghdad), and the chieftain of the House of Kasham (a local tribe) all took their separate shares from the Endowment’s income in cash as well as in kind. This, then, was the constituency of people who had an interest in supporting the governor of Baghdad’s wielding authority over the shrines in Karbala and Najaf. Under palatial oversight, the chief eunuch patronized his underlings and associates from within the palace court. A person of such affiliation would invest beforehand a handsome amount of money at the capital under the name of “rewards” (جوائز), which was a kind of investiture tax otherwise paid not before but after an appointment, and again “courtly fees,” so that he could secure appointment to the trusteeship of the Martyria Endowment by the master of the padishah’s harem. Once in Iraq, he first had to break even and then move into profit. Therefore the trustee named by the chief eunuch would sometimes withhold produce from the Endowment’s crop-fields, issue fines to those dwelling on the Endowment’s grounds, obtain personal gain from the holdings of the Endowment such as tax-farms, and sell the sinecures of the Endowment by auction.¹⁵

It made little difference to the state whether the Martyria of Ali and Husayn were subordinated to the Chief Accountancy Chancery through the governorate of Baghdad, or to the Lesser Accountancy Chancery through the chief eunuch’s oversight. Both hierarchies ended up fiscally in the imperial finance department (دفتر دارلق) and in the State Registry’s (دفترخانه عامره) logs, and politically in the grand vizier’s edict, sometimes even the padishah’s hand-writ (برات همايون), either way bringing forth an imperial charter (خط همايون). Which office of the imperial finance department audited the Endowment and which arm of the imperial court ran the Martyria made a difference in how the resources of this business in Iraq were steered and who benefited from them. But as for the state's lordship rights, both alternatives amounted to the same thing.

Among the uses of shrine endowments was the allotting of endowment wealth to build a patronage network between beneficiaries and the overseeing authority. The resources dealt out through Ali's and Husayn's endowments were great enough to give rise to local economies of their own in Najaf and Karbala, making the shrine, the town, and the surrounding countryside one and the same economic unit. To understand how central this was in the running of the Martyria, it is enough to look at how frequently free cash "stipends" (وظيفه), in-kind "allowances" (جرايه), and "holiday bonus" (عيديه) for the titular positions of "beadsman" (دعاگو), "retiree" (تقاعد), "elder" (شيخ), sayyid, mulla, and to some extent "sweeper" (فراش), come up in transactions and logs of these shrine endowments.¹⁶

The term beadsman is the courtly name of a stipend-holder whose only function was to praise the patron(s), that is the governor or the chief eunuch, the grand vizier, and the monarch. So, beadsmanship was a symbolic conferral, a salary without any service for its recipients other than speaking up for the imperial court in the provinces, given to those whose non-opposition, owing to their potential influence, was worth securing with money, and to those who had won the favor of the monarch or one of his ministers. Having an imperial investiture of a post at the endowment made sure that the beadsmen would not have a hard time finding listeners. And being paid for this guaranteed that the beneficiary deemed being in good standing with the government the means of his livelihood rather than a burden on top of a day job. Bestowals of beadsmanship became overwhelmingly a way to reward in networks of favoritism, insomuch as to endanger the fulfillment of the original function of the funds from which these arbitrary conferrals were made.¹⁷ The retirees likewise were mostly the beadsmen who had become too old or sick to show up in public for propaganda, rather than pensioners who had formerly done real work for the Endowment. In other words, it was the norm that most “work” at shrine endowments amounted merely to the post-holder’s swaying the public opinion on behalf of his patron.

17 M. İpşirli, "Duâgû," Türk Diyanet Vakfı İslâm Ansiklopedisi 9 (1994): 541-542. See TSMA. E. 302/3 for a clear example of this relationship based on mutual interest embedded in the institution of "beadsmanship." In this letter from Abdülkerim the chief of Prophet Muhammad's sanctuary in Medina to a vizier Mustafa Pasha dated by the archivist to the year 1652/1653, the sender states how he, upon receiving and dealing out to the entitled ones the padishah's yearly surre—treasury and "alms" to the Hejaz, gathered the clergy, dwellers, wayfarers, and visitors with the specific reason of praying publicly for the monarch, every week on Mondays and Thursdays, especially in Muhammad's shrine, and how these well-wishers of the padishah held a procession in glorification and veneration of the padishah.

Moreover, whenever the holder of a stipend or allowance died or willingly gave up the position, the Endowment sinecure left behind was normally bestowed upon his son. This we see in the appointment logs noting that the holder had taken over the post “from the vacancy of his father” (عن محلول پدرش), typically upon the father’s death. If the holder wished to give up the sinecure while still alive, he then petitioned the imperial government saying that he “forsook” (فراغت) his stipend or allowance from the Martyria for his “biological son” (صلبی اوغلی) to take over. “Being the biological son of the deceased whose position became vacant” was deemed enough for the “biological son to be the entitled and rightful” replacement (فوت اولوب یری محلول اولماق ایله صلبی اوغلی (...). محل و مستحق اولمغین).¹⁸

On top of these job definitions and entitlements also came the exemption from some taxes for the sayyids dwelling in or near these shrine towns.¹⁹ So, the state, or the dignitaries of the state, not only created life-long ties of interest with local individuals but also turned provincial propagandism for the government, or for certain dignitaries, into a family trade that was handed down from father to son. Of course, what the state bestowed and what the Endowment’s stipendiary pocketed were funds otherwise meant for the public good. These allotments were marketed as being for the public good, whereas they were indeed a transfer of wealth from the state to a few individuals in an unspoken but well-understood deal. This deal can also be understood as a means to build lasting bonds between far-away townships and the imperial court, in this case between the Iraqi countryside and the Empire centered in southeastern Europe. The state cannot have failed to see the Ottomanizing drive that came along with such ties.

Depending on which bureau of the imperial finance department audited the Martyria Endowments (and hence the shrines, mosques, affiliated buildings, paid positions, income sources, and alms-giving to dwellers and visitors of Najaf and Karbala), any process or transaction was logged into either “Baghdad’s accounting register of the State Treasury (دفتر محاسبه خزینه عامره),” or the “accounting register of the illustrious Endowment of the Two illustrious Martyria (دفتر خزینه اوقاف شریف مشهدين شریفین),” both kept at Constantinople.²⁰ Besides, a new imperial survey of income sources for the Province of Baghdad brought forth the “new survey register (یکی تحریر دفتري),” which too logged the holdings, income, outgoings, and paid positions of the Endowment, and therefore served as another official reference for later processes. The State Treasury’s accounting register of the Endowment and the new survey register of the Baghdad Governorate were the two authoritative logs, which later decrees, petitions, applications, and annotations rested upon by giving the references “as per the register of” (بر موجب دفتر) and “is recorded and written in the register of” (دفترنده مسطور و مقیددر). The handover of the auditing from the Chief Accountancy Chancery to that of the Lesser Accountancy of Sanctuary Endowments likewise triggered a new specific survey of the endowments of Karbala and Najaf, for which the Imperial Court sent a surveyor and a palace Gatekeeper, and whose fulfillment brought forth a new survey register.²¹

The appointments not only of the Endowment’s “prayer-leaders” (امام جامع) and “preachers” (خطیب)²² but also its lower-ranking “sweepers” and “servants” (خدام) went through the official ladder starting from a village in Iraq and, passing through the provincial center, ended up wherever the Imperial Court then was, be it Constantinople, somewhere in the Balkans, or even Hungary.²³ The transactions therefore involved offices, posts, and persons well beyond the pilgrims or the endowment personnel, and a geography much wider than the shrine towns. There were alternative procedures to run the processes, depending on whether the Imperial Court had the governor of Baghdad or the chief eunuch to oversee the Martyria. Either way, candidates would make known their willingness or rightfulness for positions to the official in charge.

At times when the Martyria were under governorate control, the director of the institution was the “trustee of the Endowment of the Two illustrious Martyria”. For appointments under his watch, the trustee put forward the candidates with a “submission (عرض)” of his. This submission was sometimes laid before the governor of Baghdad, who then either rejected or installed the candidate by issuing his edict (بیورولدی), and submitted the matter further to the grand vizier for approval along with a “Baghdad Treasury certificate (بغداد خزینه سی تذکره سی).” Or the trustee could forward his submission to the grand vizier via a submission by the governor of Baghdad himself, without an edict or certificate alongside it. The trustee himself was also appointed through the same steps.²⁴

When the Martyria were under the oversight of the palatials' faction, by contrast, the directorship lay with the "inspector of the Two illustrious Sanctuaries (حرمین شریفین مفتشی)" of Mecca and Medina. This inspector, who managed the Empire-wide endowments for the Kaaba and Muhammad's shrine, presented nominations for positions before the "overseer of the Two illustrious Sanctuaries (حرمین شریفین ناظری)," who was the Chief Eunuch of the Palace Harem. The appointment, including that of the Endowment's trustee serving under the inspector, by the overseeing Chief Eunuch was then submitted to the grand vizier for approval. The trustee could give written submissions directly to the grand vizier if a decision by the overseer was not needed.²⁵

Extraordinarily, even holders of any lower positions could skip the overseeing office and straightforwardly "petition" (عرضحال) the grand vizierate about, for example, the salary of the local chief of the House of Muhammad (نقیب الاشراف) or that of the sayyid-chieftain of Husayn's shrine in Karbala, market fees, customs tolls, courtly dues, croplands, or workshops endowed to the Martyria. This could happen above all when the petitioner wanted the imperial court to override a decision made by the trustee or the inspector.²⁶

Notwithstanding which faction controlled the Endowment of the Martyria, and even when an applicant bypassed his superiors in the hierarchy, all appointments and grants were in the end subject to the approval of the grand vizier. In general, the grand vizier's chief of staff (صدارت کدخدا سی) referred an incoming petition or submission to the imperial minister of finance (دفتردار) for him to write an informed "notification" (اعلام), and once it came back, either to the Chief Accounting Bureau in the case of governorate's control, or to the Lesser Accountancy Chancery of the Sanctuaries in the case of the palatials' oversight, for a "marginal annotation" (درنگار) of what was written in the state logs about the incumbency of the said position at the Endowment to be copied out. Exceptionally, the minister of finance himself could start the process by writing a submission to the grand vizier about the Martyria of Najaf and Karbala.²⁷ After the referral came back to the grand vizierate from the finance and accounting departments, the grand vizier approved or rejected the appointment by writing his own edict. When a matter was too sensitive or controversial, the grand vizier instead wrote a "summarization" (تلخیص) of the whole story for the monarch himself to have the final say. In that case, the monarch wrote his handwrit atop the summarization. The grand vizier then forwarded the monarch's handwrit or his own edict, depending on by which command the matter was finalized, again to be logged into the relevant register and for an imperial charter to be issued to the appointee. Every finalized appointment, ranging in importance from the granting of a retirement pay to an Endowment stipend-holder to the more fundamental question of who should be made the trustee of the Endowment, was ultimately certified with an imperial charter of investiture. Among these items of correspondence were also conferrals of authority for officiating over Iranian pilgrims visiting the shrines.²⁸

The documents bear witness that visitors from Iran could directly appeal to the Ottoman grand vizierate, signing their petitions collectively as the "pilgrims of 'Ajam (حجاج عجم)," as they were also called by the Ottoman state and the Safavid state. Alternatively, one or a few pilgrims from Iran could separately send petitions underwritten with their names and status as Iranian pilgrims. When claiming a right from Ottoman authorities, Iranian pilgrims cited prior imperial decrees (فرمان همايون) that were still in force, or asked for the issue of a new imperial decree addressed to their deputy as well as agha, so that they might have their right officially logged in writing ready for citation in some future instance.²⁹ Both the deputy, whom the pilgrims chose from among themselves, and the agha, whom the Sublime Porte appointed upon the pilgrims, could "submit" matters straightforwardly to the grand vizier, if a settlement could not be reached with the judge and the governor of the province. Even the lower-ranking "packer" (عكّام باشی) was appointed through these channels and the fulfillment of this appointment needed an imperial decree. The imperial government bestowed, not the post but, the title and "rank of master-gatekeeper of the Sublime Porte (درگاه عالی/معلی قیوچی باشیلغی پایه سی)" upon the Iranian deputy of the pilgrims, so as to set his standing within the Ottoman hierarchy. As a token of how significant the bestowal of this rank was, the deputy "petitioned (عرضحال)" the grand vizierate before receiving it, but wrote a "submission (عرض)" to the grand vizierate once he was made a court officer³⁰ (the same differentiation was in place in appeals to the imperial government by the Empire's subjects, who wrote petitions, and by Ottoman officials, who wrote submissions). Iranian pilgrims, sometimes through "their caretaker and legal deputy (امین و وکیل شرعی)" could even appeal directly to the imperial court for redress of their grievances.³¹ The fact that this channel was open to them, and that the imperial government accorded their deputies formal Ottoman titulature, hints that although Iranian pilgrims were not declared to be Ottoman subjects, they were not seen as foreigners either. Ottoman law applied to them almost unreservedly.

Likewise, Ottoman judges in the provinces heard and ruled on the cases between the Iranians themselves. Lawsuits between Iranian visitors and their former representatives were also settled by means of the Ottoman judiciary and logged into courthouse registers. Sometimes, Iranians already dwelling in the Empire could undermine the undertaking of the incoming pilgrims from Iran, for instance by swindling the caravan. Just as in complaints from Iranian pilgrims about Ottoman authorities, service providers, or subjects, such cases too were settled by the governor and the judge of the province or the county (سنجاق), not only in the borderlands of Erzurum, Kars, Van, Diyarbekir, and Baghdad but also in Aleppo, Damascus, Jerusalem, Gaza, and Ajlun, usually at the behest of an imperial decree. Ottoman judges not only heard the cases of Iranian pilgrims but also saw to the works on pilgrimage buildings: the imperial court had the judges examine and oversee the renewals done at these works. Judges likewise logged such projects on pilgrimage sites into their courthouse registers and issued judicial deeds on matters concerning pilgrimage at and endowment of the shrines.³² They thus functioned as notary public and official witness in the framework of these shrines frequented by Iranians. By this means they also wrote down the minutes of relevant sittings of the governor's council and courthouse hearings, besides auditing shrine-related commissions in the field and registering the findings.

In one exceptional practice, though, the Ottoman state differentiated Iranian visitors from imperial subjects. The pilgrims in the Iranian caravan that used the Iraqi road had to hire escort troops from the governor of Basra to protect them from Bedouin onslaughts while going to and coming back from the Hejaz. The reason for this was that they could not bring guards from Iran into Ottoman territory, and as they were not imperial subjects, the Ottoman officials' protecting specifically them counted as extra service. In return for this, the Iranian subjects at the caravan had to pay an additional fee, whereas the Shiite Ottoman subjects who had joined the Iranian caravan while it passed through Iraq did not pay this fee, as the Ottoman authorities were already responsible for taking care of them.³³

Though the Safavid state did not have a permanent diplomatic mission in the Ottoman Empire, the pilgrims coming from Iran did not need one to deal with the imperial government or its provincial officials either. The Sublime Porte readily dealt with the Iranian pilgrims as a corporate body to which the Empire's law applied. Any special, extra-territorial, or international status that Iranian pilgrims may have had in Ottoman lands was not represented by the Safavid State. They were rather subject to the Ottoman judiciary system that rested upon a blending of the monarchic law, sharia courthouse regulations, and decrees. The same is true for the provincial judges' functioning as notary public in matters on the pilgrimage shrines much visited by Iranians as well. These findings call for further studies on the law of subjecthood, extraterritoriality, and neighboring polities in the early modern Islamdom. However, one must beware of potential pitfalls when looking for connections between the information presented here from pre-modernity and the concepts of nationality, extraterritoriality, and alienage from modern times.³⁴ In early modernity, there was subjecthood rather than citizenship or nationality for persons, and a legally unequal hierarchy rather than a principle of equality for independent polities. Besides, some non-subjects could well have a hybrid status, which may be called non-alien outsiders and which could arise from not only laws or treaties of exception but also unwritten conventions and unspoken understandings.

It passes as conventional knowledge that the policy of the Ottoman state towards pilgrims coming from Iran was to let them in but have them link up with the main caravan, which travelled over Syria, instead of taking the Iraqi road.³⁵ While this may have been the Ottomans' initial course of action in the mid-sixteenth century, by the mid-seventeenth century this was no longer the case. By that date, the Empire was permitting Iranian pilgrims to use the Iraqi road, and appointed for this highway a third pilgrimage commander, like those of the Syrian and the Egyptian roads. Many documents indeed show that the Ottomans even encouraged the Iranians to visit the Imamic shrines in Iraq. Through stipends, gifts, buildings, oversight, endowments, administration, and visitation by dignitaries, the Ottoman state invested in the upkeep of Najaf, Karbala, Samarra, and Baghdad within the network of the holy spots of the Empire next to Mecca, Medina, and Jerusalem.

Whereas the pilgrims' contacts with Ottoman subjects, authorities, and the administration of the pilgrimage caravan were matters subject to imperial law, the larger question of whether or not to authorise the dispatch of pilgrim caravans from Iran to the Ottoman Empire was still a business of diplomacy. For example, the Safavid court in Isfahan and the Ottoman governorate of Baghdad together appointed the "pilgrimage commander" (امیر حج) of the Iranian caravan that travelled over the Iraqi road. The two sides also worked together on the early organization of a forthcoming convoy. This, as much as being a subject-matter of the highest level of Ottoman-Safavid diplomacy between the padishah, the shah, and their grand viziers, concerned at least as much the borderland governors of, above all, Erzurum and Baghdad, who dealt not only with their cross-border Safavid counterparts but also directly with the shah's prime minister.³⁶

In Iran, both the pilgrims as a whole and individual dignitaries, including vassal princes, had to get the shah's permission before setting out westwards.³⁷ The shah's own officials, such as the royal superintendent, the chief of household staff, or the privy armor-bearer, and other prominent figures, such the grand vizier's son, could also join the pilgrimage caravan,³⁸ but did so in a private capacity, without any acknowledged authority over the pilgrims while in Ottoman territory. The last word on the Iranian caravan's setting out toward Ottoman lands belonged of course to the shah, for the undertaking was more than just a civilian journey abroad and it bore diplomatic as well as political significance.

Another Iranian caravan, which came in from Yerevan and linked up with the imperial convoy in Damascus by faring over the Erzurum road, was led by an officer bearing an imperial charter. This leader dealt not only with the Ottoman court and governors but also with the Safavid governor of Yerevan/Chuqursa'd, and through him did the said borderland governors of Iran and the Empire exchange letters, vouchers, etc.³⁹

For the local economies of Karbala and Najaf, the inflow of Iranian pilgrims to and through Iraq was remarkable. One can liken this to the Indian pilgrims in the early modern Hejaz, where the local establishment saw them and the Mughal court as "milk cows," and took care to keep up the yearly inflow of pilgrims (who spent well and were taxed heavily), royal donations, gifts, alms, and other kinds of charity.⁴⁰ An unusual drop in the number of Iranians visiting in a given year would lead to a notable fall in earnings of the Martyria Endowment from some of its income items such as tax farms (مقاطعات), the inn, the sale of rosaries and of shrouds, and the estates (بيت المال) of those Iranians who bequeathed their wealth to these shrines. On top of these came the "vows" (نذورات) in cash and in objects made of gold or silver, not only from actual Iranian visitors but also from individuals in Iran, even the shah himself, who did not come themselves but sent their alms, and the revenues from burying dead Iranians into graves next to the shrines. Neither vows nor burial revenues nor estates seem to have depended on how many Iranians came in a given year, because the aforesaid money and corpses were mostly shipped from Iran, without the need for the donor to visit or for the bequeather to die while in Ottoman Iraq.⁴¹ Among the countless bodies thus brought from Iran to Karbala or Najaf for burial, because these people had bequeathed their wealth to the Martyrdom Endowment and their bodies to the graves at the shrines of Ali or Husayn, could be well-off commoners, elite non-officials, and royal officers, as high as a grand vizier of Iran dying while in office.⁴²

The management of the Iranian pilgrims in the Empire sometimes became a subject of what one could call Ottoman internal diplomacy, between the imperial court and vassal princes. In the monarch's writs to the princes of Mecca, a letter in form but a decree in content, it was stressed that with the shah of Iran peace was in force, which the prince also had to abide by, and owing to which the Iranian pilgrims were not to be burdened with unlawful exactions in the Hejaz. These decree-like letters never brought up the sectarian identity of the Iranian pilgrims, whom, just as the rest of the Muslims, the prince of Mecca was to take good care of.⁴³ The Safavid court itself could also ask for "God's shadow, the monarch of Islam and the Muslims" (ظل الله، پادشاه، سلطان الاسلام و المسلمين اسلام، خلافة) of the "Caliphate" (خلافة), that is the Ottoman ruler, to command the prince of Mecca and the pashas of other provinces that they not charge the "pilgrims of Ajam" more than the conventional amounts for fees, and about almost any matter that concerned the Iranian pilgrim caravan and its officer.⁴⁴ Safavid shahs also corresponded with the princes of Mecca in formal exchanges of courtesy, though not through missions but by means of travelling pilgrims.⁴⁵ The Safavid court must have resorted to Constantinople's sway over the Hejaz when an issue relating to pilgrims could not be settled through these letters of courtesy to Mecca.

The Safavids' showing such reverence to the Ottomans was in line with the overall course of the diplomacy between the two states in the later seventeenth and the early eighteenth centuries, in which the Safavids were acknowledging the Ottoman monarch's universal caliphate, exchanging prayers with the Ottomans for sharing heavenly remuneration, and defining the relationship between the two courts in a Quranic framework. In the same vein, the Islamic ulama became stripped of their role in Ottoman-Safavid diplomacy so that their doctrinal positions not undermine the rapprochement, while politicians and bureaucrats took it upon themselves to utter in diplomatic dealings the Quran and Muhammad's hadith in a way that backed up, rather than hindered, the growing friendship. As a matter of course, between the Ottoman and the Safavid states, there was no longer the talk of doctrine, orthodoxy, or sectarianism.⁴⁶

The Safavid monarchy also drew on its diplomacy with the Sublime Porte to facilitate its access, albeit indirect and limited, to the Imams' shrines and the Martyria Endowment in Iraq throughout the late seventeenth and the early eighteenth centuries. The shah's low-key request, presented by his ambassador to the Ottoman court, for the padishah's authorisation as a one-off to renew the sarcophagi of Imams Ali al-Hadi and Hasan al-Askari in Samarra was granted and enacted as an imperial decree.⁴⁷

Likewise, the Iranian grand vizier's request, forwarded in his letter, for one-off authorisation to set up the new Safavid-made sarcophagi of Imams Musa al-Kazim and Muhammad al-Taqi near Baghdad was granted through the Ottoman grand vizier's answer and enacted as imperial decrees. On the other hand, the bold request that the shah's functionaries be henceforward authorized to renovate, donate to, and deal out alms at Iraq's Imamic shrines, without showing a license to provincial officials or applying for a new license from the imperial court each time, was categorically rejected.⁴⁸

Lastly, the Iranian grand vizier asked, through his letter and in the name of the shah, for the Ottoman monarch's permission to dig a water canal from the eastern Euphrates to Ali's shrine-town of Najaf. Along with this came Safavid attempts at two faits accomplis: first, Isfahan sent to Karbala an "amir" to work there side by side with the Ottoman trustee of the Martyria, to bring the Safavid endowments' money from Iran and spend it towards the Martyria, and to deal out the shah's donations there for all to see, and wanted to have the Ottoman monarchy make room for this Safavid-installed co-trustee. Next, the shah's armor-bearer brought to Medina a bejewelled pastille (مرصع شامه) as a gift from the shah but the officials there did not let him set it up within Muhammad's sepulcher on the grounds that imperial authorisation was lacking. The grand vizier of Iran asked for the Sublime Porte's licence for this initiative too.⁴⁹ The Ottoman grand vizier, remarking that nothing could be put or raised in Medina without the padishah's permission, accepted the gift itself but forbade the shah's armor-bearer to set it up on site, handing the matter with an imperial decree over to the padishah's pilgrimage superintendent instead. The shah's afore-mentioned digging open a river canal to Najaf, on the other hand, was rejected not only categorically but also with sarcasm for even daring to ask of such a thing.⁵⁰

Documents from manifold genres all agree on one thing: they do not bear the marks of any Shiite-Sunni feud that may have been there in the minds or lives of those involved in these operations. (Remarkably, this seems to have been the case even at times when a sectarian strife broke out, such as when the Ottoman-subject Shiite dwellers of Karbala openly worked to thwart the functioning of the Martyria Endowment's trustee installed by the Sunni state, to the extent that even the Shiites coming from Iran deemed the Shiite Karbala dwellers' behavior against imperial appointees unduly hostile⁵¹). If anything, the authorities of the officially Sunni empire and the pilgrims coming from the officially Shiite Iran fostered a shared, if not the same, veneration for the Imams whose shrines had become pilgrimage spots.

Representatives of the Sunni empire called the shrines of Ali (Muhammad's cousin and in Shiism his only rightful successor by God) in Najaf and that of Husayn (Ali's second son as well as second successor) in Karbala the Two illustrious Martyria. These two saints almost never come up in the documents without the titles and honors that, while also acknowledged in Sunnism, makes up the credo in Shiism: "his Holiness Imam Ali / Husayn" (حضرت امام علی / حسین). Another way of paying the same respect was, for instance, calling them the "pure-lineaged and evidently-righteous Imams who bestow honor upon the earth of Baghdad" (شرف بخش خاک بغداد اولان ائمه پاک تژاد باهر الرشاد) in an imperial decree to Baghdad's governor and judge for them to take good care of the Iranian pilgrims visiting the shrines.⁵²

There is likewise not even one utterance of or hint at sects, Shiism/Sunnism, unbelief, heresy, or sin towards the Shiite Iranian pilgrims or Safavid officials, let alone for the House of Muhammad, the Twelve Imams, their offspring, or followers. The Empire acknowledged the otherwise Shiite pilgrims only in that they "circumambulated the sacred House of God" (طواف بیت الله الحرام) and "performed the obligatory Pilgrimage and visited the honorable Martyria and the blessed Sepulchers" (اسقاط/اداء فريضه حج... زیارت مشاهد مشرفه و مرقد متبرکه). The visitors themselves were likewise called "salvation-faring / joyful pilgrims" (حجاج فلاح منهاج / ذو الالبتهاج), and in documents about pilgrimage, the overall name “Muslims” encompassed, among others, the Shiite pilgrims from Iran too.⁵³ It was not odd at all for Ottoman governors and finance ministers of Baghdad to donate handsome amounts of money and material to the Karbala and Najaf endowments, and renew its buildings, from their own pockets.⁵⁴

This does not necessarily all mean, of course, that in the period under discussion there happened no strife between the Shiite and Sunni sects of Islam. But even if sectarian disagreements still existed, they seem to have mattered little to the Sunni states’ politicians or bureaucrats, or the Shiite pilgrims’ spokesmen in their dealings with one another. Each side was in all likelihood well aware of the deep-rooted rift between the Shiite and the Sunni beliefs, but deemed it not so important as to be brought up in governmental writs, or at least they deemed it wise not to do so with an eye to mutual political interests. Either way, the non-clergy members of the Shiite and the Sunni establishments could easily play down their differences when dealing with one another even in a religious business. That the ulama seems to have been wholly left out of the Shiite-Sunni pilgrimage organization, on which they neither had a say nor were consulted, also hints at a prioritization of practicality over doctrinal niceties.

On the other hand, this reverence by a Sunni establishment towards those whom Shiism regarded as its own pillars should not be mistaken as a hidden sympathy by Ottoman/Turkish Sunnism towards Twelver Shiism. Many scholars give in to this misreading,⁵⁵ which arises from a rather modern trend of failing to acknowledge the unbridgeable difference between Qızılbaşism and Shiism. For the Ottomans (i.e. in the Anatolian-Balkan tradition of Sunnism, and still in today’s Turkey), venerating the Imams of the House of Muhammad, highlighting the rightful caliphates of Ali and Hasan, exalting Imam Husayn, deeming Imam Jafar as-Sadiq an authority for his jurisprudence work, and acknowledging the Umayyad-Abbasid oppression of the Imams, to the extent of having Ali’s legendary sword Zulfiqar on the banners of Court Corps (قپو قپودان دریا / قپودان پاشا) and the Imperial Admiral (قولری), did not breach the tenets of Sunnism, hint at a leaning towards Shiism, or even cloud the distinctions between sects.⁵⁶

The Ottoman state seems to have dealt with the Shiite pilgrims from Iran in keeping with its general policy of not officially acknowledging non-Sunni groups as corporate communities but treating them “as if they were Sunnis” without explicitly identifying them as such. The Ottoman state’s Sunnitization drive and the parallel sharpening of confessional identities within society had begun before the rise of the Safavid polity, and they went on after the end of the Ottoman-Safavid conflict.⁵⁷ Even if one accepts that the Ottoman Empire went through a “confessionalization” akin to, albeit not the same as the one that unfolded in the German lands from the mid-fifteenth century to the mid-seventeenth,⁵⁸ the documents examined here strongly suggest that sectarian issues were taken off the agenda of the peacetime contacts between the Ottoman Empire and Safavid Iran.

The Ottoman state’s main, and perhaps only, concern about the incoming Shiite pilgrims from Iran was that they were not to mingle with the local Shiite dwellers of the places they visited or passed from. To forestall any such interaction, they went to the length of investing to improve the quality of lodging provided in shrine towns, thus to disincline pilgrims from staying elsewhere. Otherwise, the Ottoman state does not seem to have been bothered by donations from Shiite Iranian sources and income stemming from the visiting Shiite Iranians for the Karbala and Najaf endowments. Instead of forbidding them, the Ottoman state chose to overshadow such donations by spending even greater sources in donating to and building up Ali’s and Husayn’s shrines.⁵⁹

I disagree with this reading, for Ahlulbayt-friendliness in the Turko-Persian tradition of Sunnism has rather been in the mainstream, and bore no implication of a leaning towards Shiism.

[I: submission]

To the ground of the Court orbited by the sky and the Audience of heavenly might, submission by this powerless servant is as follows

Your servant Sayyid Zayd, who currently is the trustee of the endowment of the Illustrious Martyria located at Baghdad, is the initiator of this submission of servitude. All of the former as well as direct stipendiaries [of the endowment] are satisfied with and thankful to him; [he] strives to build up the aforesaid endowment; he is the current holder of the aforesaid trusteeship. The request to reconfirm [his trusteeship] and to bestow a sublimely glorious, illustrious Charter upon his hand is submitted to the Stately Court. Nonetheless, the decree is of the justice-titled Gate.

submission, marginalia, and edict

[I: submission]

To the ground of the Court orbited by the sky and the Audience of heavenly might, may its sublimity not decline until Doomsday, the submission by this powerless servant is as follows

Your beadsman Sayyid Abdulaziz from among the noble Sayyids, who bears this submission of servitude, has, since the imperial conquest and with the illustrious Charter of high glory, been the trustee at the endowments of Imam Ali his Holiness, Imam Husayn his Holiness, and Imam Musa Kazim his Holiness, may sublime God be pleased with them, located in the province of Baghdad. There has been no shortcoming of his in the required service that pertains to the trusteeship of the said endowment. A non-affiliated person named Abbas, who is known for being a heretic and who earlier was at the side of the Kızılbaş of evil-livelihood, now gave, while his brother and nephew are [still] alongside the shah, false notification and had the aforesaid trusteeship chartered upon his relative named Sayyid Zayd with a majestic imperial handwrit. Aside from wholly violating the above-written one in this way, they themselves are eating from the wealth of the aforesaid endowments. A request is [hereby] submitted for the worldwide-obeyed Decree that the aforesaid Abbas and Zayd be removed, the mentioned trusteeship be reconfirmed back to the above-written beadsman of Yours, the illustrious Charter of high glory be bestowed upon his hand, and the charters that the aforesaid ones received by false notification be taken back from their hands and be sent to the Stately Court. Nonetheless, decree is of the Court of righteousness.

Trusteeship of the endowments of Imam Ali, Imam Husayn, Musa Kazim, and Muhammad? their Holiness, at Baghdad:

held by Sayyid Abdulaziz:

In the register it is written that

While the trusteeship of the mentioned endowments was upon him, the unaffiliated person named Abbas took and interfered with it. Whereas the aforesaid Sayyid Abdulaziz had previously been approved and the highly-glorious Charter had been given to his hand, he [Abbas] had not contented himself but interfered again. Therefore, in accordance with the charter in his [Abdulaziz's] hand, it [the trusteeship] was reconfirmed to the mentioned Sayyid Abdulaziz on the eighteenth day of September of [sixteen] sixty-eight in accordance with the imperial tenure copy.

Shah Ahmad b. Ibrahim Khan the ever victorious

The revered minister, the grand marshal, the order of the world, the piercing-minded administrator of the affairs of the public, the accurate-opinioned perfecter of the matters of all creatures, the paver of the foundation of the state and prosperity, the affirmer of the pillars of bliss and imposingness, the one who is surrounded by the manifold graces of [God] the Sublime King, my vizier Ahmad Pasha who is the governor of Baghdad may sublime God make his imposingness last; and the most-just of the Muslim judges, the foremost of the custodians of the monotheists, the mine of virtue and precision, the bearer of the banners of canon and religion, the inheritor of the knowledges of prophets and apostles, the designee for the abundant grace of God the helper, the master judge of Baghdad may his virtue grow! When my imperial high cypher arrives, it shall be known as follows.

Muhammad Naqiyaddin, who by my majestic Imperial Handwrit is the lifetime trustee of the Endowments of the Illustrious Martyria of Imam Ali and Imam Husayn their Holinesses may God be pleased with them at Baghdad the heaven-like, sent a petition to my Imperial Army, [and reported the following]. The aforesaid endowment was under the oversight of the chief [eunuch] of the Imperial Harem; it was nonchargeable, non-interfereable, and autonomous. Then, the governors of Baghdad, under the name of oversight money and courtly fees, and their retinues, sentries, customs superintendents, and other agents interfered and aggressed uncanonically and unlawfully. And, ...⁶⁰ the aforesaid trusteeship, the previous governor of Baghdad did not let the endowment keep but himself seized and kept two thousand five hundred thalers for himself under the name of oversight money, one thousand thalers for his chief of staff, five hundred thalers for the former treasurer of Baghdad under the name of courtly fees, five hundred thalers for Mehmed the chief of staff, five hundred thalers...,⁶¹ two hundred and twenty-five thalers for Mustafa, two hundred and ten thalers for the butlers, hundred and eight thalers for his proxy Ali, six hundred thalers for the magistrate of Hilla, and in the years of hundred-and-two and hundred-and-three the accruing cash and five hundred sacks of produce from the village of Mavahin, although it is among the annexes of the aforesaid endowment. In total, he took and seized, by oppression and force, seven thousand and four hundred and ten thalers of cash and one thousand sacks of grain from the endowment's wealth without hesitation. When the register of the Accounting of the Sanctuaries of Mecca-Medina was looked at, it was found to be written that the illustrious Endowments of the Martyria of Imam Ali and Imam Husayn and Imam Abbas their Holinesses, may sublime God be pleased with them, located at Baghdad the heaven-like are nonchargeable, non-interfereable, and autonomous in all respects; that governors of Baghdad are not to take one asper or one kernel of oversight money or courtly fees; that retinue aghas, sentry aghas, Hilla's magistrates, the judges, or other superintendents as well as agents are not to intervene or violate; and that it is thus autonomous. From among the Gatekeepers of my Sublime Court ...⁶² may his might grow is appointed and my illustrious order has been issued by the finance department for the legally assigned wealth of the endowment to be collected in its entirety from the aforesaid pasha and those mentioned in name. Since [petitioner Muhammad Naqiyaddin the trustee] requested my Imperial Decree that all act accordingly, it is my order to act in accordance with my illustrious order issued by the finance department.

I command that once [this] arrives, you shall act upon my imposingly mighty decree issued in this regard and my illustrious order given by the finance department; henceforward you shall not consent to or allow its contrary. Know thus, and put trust in the Illustrious Sign.

Eternal House ... and ... Exalted Dynasty. Thereafter, You shall seriously strive for the welfare of the residents of the Sanctuaries, protection of the pilgrims and visitors coming from all over the globe to visit the Ancient House [of God], and the patronage of the travelers as well as traders.... As you earlier committed to, You shall take careful action to welcome, escort, and ... guard from the Bedouin bandits the joyful pilgrims from the way-stop of 'Alâ until Medâin Sâlih. And, in particular:

You shall take good care to abide by the rules of peace ... with the sublimely dignified shah of Persia, which have been imperatively firm from the blissful times of Our high-born forefathers and heaven-bound fathers ... until this day, and which have been accepted as well as admitted by him [i.e. to shah], [you shall also take good care] to not impose tolls upon the pilgrims from Persia, to look after them in accordance with my majestic imperial Handwrit that was issued, to pay much attention to the orderliness of the affairs of the public, righteousness of the circumstances of the pilgrims, and all matters delegated to your attention, and to beget nice deeds that will double Our monarchical favor about You. Know thus!

Decree to the governor of Aleppo, to the governor of Damascus, to the great-judges of Aleppo and Damascus, and to the judges of ... and ...⁶³ is as follows.

Pilgrims from Persia petitioned. These are pilgrims from Persia; an illustrious Order together with the blissful imperial Handwrit had come out saying that these not be interfered with or harassed in any way at the localities they pass from. Nevertheless, the person known as Haji Mustafa of Tabriz, a dweller of Damascus, came in front of them in Malatya, and took from each of them two golds as they went to the illustrious pilgrimage and one gold as they returned. Aside from this, he also took their money forcibly under the name of "money for the charter and the guide." He [thus] oppressed and violated them, and they request my Imperial Decree that he be prohibited. Therefore, if such uncanonical violation and oppression have happened, [for you] to act upon my previously issued illustrious Decree and to prohibit him ...

Document 19 (EV.d. 45167)

endowment register

consisting of imperial handwrit, summarization, joint submission, referral, notification, marginal annotation, petition and scribal note

[I: submission by both ministers of finance]

The submission of Your servants is as follows.

The illustrious Endowments of Imam Ali and Imam Husayn and Imam Abbas their Holiness, may sublime God be pleased with them all, located in the province of Baghdad the heaven-like, had been nearing ruin, because previous trustees had not supported or protected the subjects of the Endowment, and former governors of Baghdad had been eating off the stipends of the stipendiaries and committing violations. Therewith, Ali the previous trustee had made an appeal to the Imperial Court during the auspicious times of the late and deceased Sultan Mehmed Khan his Majesty may his earth be pleasant, saying that the aforesaid Endowment should be annexed to the oversight of the Chief [Eunuch] of the Imperial Harem, registered into the Accountancy of the Sanctuaries of Mecca-Medina, and held in autonomy, that governors of Baghdad not take one asper or grain from the aforesaid Endowment under the name of oversight money or courtly fees, and that officers of welcome and sentry, the overseer, chieftains of the Kasham tribe, magistrates of Hilla, judges, and other superintendents as well as agents had been bringing about the ruin of the aforesaid Endowment with their interferences and aggression. Thereupon, it had been registered into the Accountancy of the Sanctuaries of Mecca-Medina, then an Imperial Handwrit had been issued in the year of ten ninety-four for the Chief [Eunuch] of the Imperial Harem to be the overseer, the old records of the aforesaid Endowment had been given over to the Chancery of the Accountancy of the Sanctuaries of Mecca-Medina from the Chief Accountancy, later a surveyor scribe and a Gatekeeper had been sent and a survey had been made, the survey register had come and been recorded in the year of ninety-nine, and since the year of eleven hundred and two the cited trusteeship had been delegated to one person each year through submission by Chief [Eunuch]s of the Imperial Harem. It is found to be recorded thus in the chanceries. But because the dominance of former governors over the trustees and subjects of the villages of the aforesaid Endowments had led to the weariness of these [trustees and subjects], every three-to-four years one of the eunuchs had come to be independently appointed and sent as trustee, so as not to back away from the annexation and transfer to the oversight of the Chief [Eunuch] of the Imperial Harem.

However, over the last few years, some Halberdiers gradually arose, and by giving extravagant rewards and courtly fees to a lot of places, took over the cited trusteeship. So much so that from among the Halberdiers a person named Gergerli Husayn became the trustee in the year of eleven eighteen, held it for two years, and unrightfully seized and exacted fines on the crops and belongings of the subjects of the aforesaid Endowment. He could not be turned away from his inappropriate actions arising against God's will in such desirable services, and he passed away thus in Baghdad. The amount and belongings, which he, saying "I am affiliated with the Chief [Eunuch] of the Imperial Harem," gathered up from the Endowment's subjects and from the dwellers of Baghdad and even the governor of Baghdad due to his complete dominance over them, he spent to broaden his influence, to put his affairs in order, and for his arbitrary fancies. This aside, he left behind almost one hundred and fifty purses of cash as well as belongings, which were brought here to his inheritors. Then, since the year of eleven twenty, the ones named Halberdier Haji Osman and Yedekçi Ali arose, and for a few years, received the written nomination for the aforesaid trusteeship for free. The aforesaid Yedekçi Ali roamed the markets and inns, saying "I sell the mentioned trusteeship of the Martyria of Najaf-Karbala," as if selling a state tax-farm to whomever paid the most. He sold it once to the person named Hasan Çorbacı from among the captains of Armorers, once to Ahmad Sayyaf the merchant, then to a Janissary private from the dwellers of Harput, and then to Baghdad's former minister of finance Omar Bey, taking from them fifteen purses of money for each year.

Today, the trustee is again from among the Halberdiers. Since the time that the cited trusteeship had been annexed to the oversight of the Chief [Eunuch] of the Imperial Harem, the trustees, by virtue of being misers, have been filing submissions for the Halberdiers at the service of the Chief Eunuch to get the vacated positions, for which, among the civilian dwellers of Baghdad, persons entitled to hold stipends as well as allowances and to be resident in the required service are already available. In this way, they [i.e. the Halberdier trustees] cause weariness and setbacks to a lot of simple civilians and the cancellation of the Endowment's many services contrary to the conditions of the endower. The trustees, due to their unrefined greed and because they are making here an excessive expenditure of money, sell most of the tax-farms on the spot to Janissaries and other despicable persons. These [tax-farm buyers] haunt and harass the [dwellers], such that the [dwellers], desperate from these molestations and violations, altogether flee to another region. Thus report the unbiased persons living in Baghdad, who have a full grasp [of the matter], and a lot of credible officials of the Sublime State who come in from there [Baghdad], and inform that the removal of this oppression, violation, and transgression off the subjects of the illustrious Endowment will bring about bountiful blessings.

When the cited Endowment had formerly been under nobody's oversight, governors and judges of Baghdad had delegated the cited trusteeship to some persons, and governors and trustees had not protected the subjects but harassed and molested them. A notification about this [state of affairs] was then given with a petition. The annexation of the aforesaid Endowment to the oversight of the chief eunuchs was so as to get rid of the corruptions arising from the oversight of the governors of Baghdad and to protect and preserve the subjects of the Endowment. It is frequently reported, however, that upon annexation to the oversight of the chief eunuch of the Harem, the oppression and violation of the Endowment's subjects has become many times greater than before. It is now seen that the earlier trustee's petition was not for getting rid of the corruptions arising from governors of Baghdad but was just an outwardly rightful and artificial initiative organized to have the cited Endowment registered into the [Chancery of the Accountancy of the] Two Sanctuaries. Especially, trustees appointed by the chief eunuch also give a lot of money here under the name of rewards and courtly fees until they have the aforesaid trusteeship delegated to themselves. When they get to the site, they take action to derive their own benefit and profit, and accordingly entitling themselves in their speech with affiliation and assignment of the Majestic Monarchy, they haunt not only the Endowment's subjects but even governors of Baghdad with this false reputation, and gather up several hundred purses of money from the illustrious Endowment's subjects within a couple of years. If it is not tackled and put in order within a while, it is obvious that the subjects will altogether become wretched and the cited Endowment useless in ruins. Transforming it into an agreeable form is important and necessary.

Hereby [it is requested]: for the cited Endowment to be removed from the chief eunuch's oversight; for its registers and documents to be taken away from the Accountancy of the Sanctuaries of Mecca-Medina; for it to be registered in and given over to the Chief Accountancy as before; for governors of Baghdad themselves to personally see to the affairs of the trusteeship every year, by judicial means to make a register of the incurred income and expenditure in line with the endower's conditions at the close of the year, and to send the cited register to the Stately Court; for [the consequent year-end balance sheet] to be summarized and submitted to the Imperial Court through the grand vizier; for the universal imperial gaze to pertain [to this summarization] for nothing else than God's sake; for the awe-inspiring Imperial Handwrit—as blessing and good luck—to be drawn, saying that it should be recorded to its place [in the applicable chancery logs] after its income and expenditures are found acceptable by the imperial monarch; for the circumstances of the subjects of the cited Endowment to be personally submitted [by governors of Baghdad] to the Imperial Court and be known by the universal monarch whenever greater and lesser affairs come up; for the cited trusteeship to be delegated to the current governor of Baghdad the esteemed [Eyüplü] Hasan Pasha his Excellency the revered vizier starting from the year of eleven twenty seven and to be assigned once every three years with the condition that their circumstances be seen to as necessary; for the referred vizier to also content himself with what the endower specified in the affairs of the trusteeship; for the courtly fees, welcome officers, sentry officers, customs superintendent, the Kasham tribe's chieftains, magistrates of Hilla, judges, other officials and agents to not interfere or infringe by any means or on any account; for him [Eyüplü Hasan Pasha] to deem this imposing service a means of bliss in both worlds, to act with full justice and equity, to not harass or molest even one individual, to investigate much and pay attention in ascertaining the total income and expenditure in a year by implementing the endower's conditions, to accordingly record, register, submit, and give notification of both the income and the expenditure in this year of twenty-seven, to refrain much from giving in to greed, oppressing and maltreating, scattering, or devastating the Endowment's subjects like the governors of Baghdad who formerly oversaw and like the Halberdiers who later became trustees and others just because "the cited trusteeship became delegated to me," to take great care, pay attention, and make the effort towards the orderliness of the circumstances of [the subjects] and for their welfare, to submit and give notification of the occurring vacancies of stipends on behalf of the locals that are entitled and deserving, to indisputably strive that these [vacant positions] not be given to non-deserving persons just for the sake of an intercession or gratification; for these favorable conditions and stipulations to be taken as principles henceforward for as long as sublime God wills; for [all this] to be registered into the Chief Accountancy; and for the sublime Charter and illustrious Order to be written in the explained manner; order and decree are Yours, my blissful Sire Your Excellency.

Ibrahim Pasha the vice grand vizier! In line with your summarization, give the decree for the [Endowments of the Martyria of Najaf-Karbala] to be annexed to the Endowments of the Sanctuaries of Mecca-Medina and registered into [the Chancery of] its Accountancy, and for the chief eunuch to be the overseer!

29 August 1683

Ibrahim Pasha the vice grand vizier! Ask, inquire, and neatly submit the truth. Whether or not there is a risk and drawback in being annexed to the Endowments of the Sanctuaries of Mecca-Medina, submit!

[IV.2 finance minister's second notification: quotation from an archived submission of the vice grand vizier]

Submission by the powerless servant is as follows.

The aforesaid endowment is not safe from the oppression of violation. For it to become registered into the oversight of the chief eunuch and the Accountancy of the Sanctuaries of Mecca-Medina, so that no one encroaches, decree is Yours, my majestic and wondrous Monarch.

[IV.3 finance minister's third notification: quoting from an archived petition by the trustee]

Petition by this poor one to the blessed Imperial Court of my majestic, mighty, great, all-merciful Monarch is as follows.

By majestic Imperial Handwrit, this servant of Yours is the trustee of the Endowments of the illustrious Martyria of Najaf-Karbala of Imam Ali (may God make his face revered) his Holiness at Baghdad, and became trustee at the time of Your servant Abdi Pasha as governor of Baghdad. Whereas [before my term] it [the Endowment] had an income of one thousand and four hundred thalers, it has amounted up to ten thousand thalers thanks to the blessedness of the Imperial Handwrit of our majestic monarch. Whereas [under my term] the stipends of its beneficiaries used to be given in full and its kitchen used to operate, it is [now] declining due to violations by Ibrahim Pasha his Excellency the current governor of Baghdad. From the stipends to be given to civilians, he took two thousand thalers for himself and five hundred thalers under the name of courtly fees. Then he handed in to me a register including a seal and a decree, for the stipends of the civilians to be given at half. Since he became the pasha [of Baghdad], he took nineteen purses of money from the illustrious Endowment in the years of ten ninety-two, ninety-three, and ninety-four. He scared this servant of Yours saying “I shall kill you,” sent one hundred and fifty horsemen upon me, and by overwhelming force took from this servant of Yours further thirty purses, saying “you had an illustrious Handwrit issued for the pashas not to interfere in the Endowment, now let’s see whether your illustrious Handwrit is of any use to you.” As I could not save myself by any means, I fled to here by getting a permission with the intention of [going on] the illustrious Pilgrimage. Even the permission to go on the illustrious Pilgrimage, [only] Your servant Shatir Ahmad Agha [could] take [for me]. After I went away, he made my brother—Your servant—the trustee of the trusteeship. What he took from the illustrious Endowment since I left is not known.

For God’s and his Messenger’s sake; to show mercy to my situation; to cast a gaze on the blissful Imperial Handwrit and the register bearing his own seal, which are in my hand; to save this illustrious Endowment from the aforesaid one’s hands; to collect by judicial means the nineteen purses of money he took from the illustrious Endowment and the thirty purses of money he took from this servant of Yours, as Mehmed Efendi the finance minister of Baghdad and Abdullah Efendi the deputy-judge of Belgrade, who are currently here, know that these monies of ours were given; to collect these monies by judicial means; henceforward to annex the aforesaid Endowment to the oversight of Your servant the chief eunuch of the Harem; to register it into the Accountancy of the Sanctuaries of Mecca-Medina; to make the aforesaid Endowment non-chargeable, non-interfereable, and autonomous; to hold and run it as such; henceforward for governors of Baghdad not to take one asper or one grain from the aforesaid Endowment under the name of oversight money or courtly fees; for the welcoming officers, sentry officers, the overseer, chieftains of the Kasham tribe, magistrates of Hilla, judges, other officials, and agents not to interfere or infringe henceforth; for the illustrious Handwrit to be accordingly bestowed; for the Endowment to altogether be revived by my majestic and mighty Monarch; and to get good prayers from the civilians; decree is Yours, my majestic and mighty Monarch.

Your servant Ali

[IV.4 finance minister’s fourth notification: quoting from an archived notification]

Ali, who by the stately Imperial Handwrit is the trustee of the illustrious Endowments of the illustrious Martyria of Najaf-Karbala of Imam Ali (may God make his face revered) his Holiness located at Baghdad the heaven-like, presented a petition to the Imperial Court while on the field of Belgrade, ...,⁶⁵ and requested grace. Thereby, as the aforesaid Endowment was not safe from the oppression of violation, a summarization was submitted to the feet of the Highest Throne that it be registered into oversight of the chief eunuch of the Imperial Harem and the Accountancy of the Sanctuaries of Mecca-Medina, so that no one encroaches upon it. Thereupon, in accordance with the blissful Imperial Handwrit, which became issued, the highly glorious Decree came out on 4 September 1683, saying “the mentioned Endowment shall be annexed to the oversight of the chief eunuch of the Harem and registered into the Accountancy of the Sanctuaries of Mecca-Medina.” As explained, the aforesaid Endowment, in line with the above-mentioned conditions and stipulations, became nonchargable, non-interfereable, and autonomous, annexed to the oversight of the chief eunuch of the Harem, and registered into the Accountancy of the Sanctuaries of Mecca-Medina, as per the highly glorious Decree that was issued in accordance with the incoming blissful Imperial Handwrit, and it came under the oversight of the chief eunuch. Yusuf Agha (may his sublimity continue), who is the chief eunuch of the Imperial Harem and trustee of the Endowments of the Sanctuaries of Mecca-Medina, gave a submission to the Imperial Army and reported the request: that it be conferred for life to be held from 7 September 1683 onwards and that the highly glorious Charter be given anew, because the mentioned trusteeship of the Endowments of the Najaf-Karbala Martyria of Imam Ali [and Husayn] his Holiness Ali (may God make his face revered) was held by the cited Ali with a fixed stipend and by Imperial Handwrit of bliss, also because he served the illustrious Endowment righteously and worked hard for it. A Decree of high glory came out to confer accordingly. The trusteeship of the aforesaid Endowment, together with its fixed stipend, became conferred for life, to be held from 7 September 1683 onwards. A written note is given for the [issuance of a] renewed Charter of high glory for the illustrious Endowment to be nonchargable, non-interfereable, and autonomous, with the condition that the referred Ali (may his might increase) hold it in the same manner as former trustees and collect for the illustrious Endowment the accruing greater as well as lesser amounts of produce and tolls in the same manner as former trustees; for its accounting to be seen to in the next year; for governors of Baghdad not to interfere or intervene under the name of oversight money or courtly fees; for welcome officers, sentry officers, overseers, chieftains of the Kasham tribe, magistrates of Hilla, judges, other officials, and agents to henceforward not interfere or intervene; and for the Endowment's trustee to hold and run it autonomously.

Thus is found to be written in [the logs of the Chancery of] the Accountancy of the Two illustrious Sancturies.

8 September 1683

[IV.5 finance minister's fifth notification: quoting from another archived notification]

Yusuf Agha, who is the overseer of the aforesaid Endowments, sent a submission to the Imperial Council. Under his oversight, located in the province of Baghdad the heaven-like, within the illustrious Endowments of Imam Ali and Imam Husayn and Imam Abbas their Holiness (may sublime God be pleased with them all), from the river of Euphrates up to the town of Imam Ali his Holiness, the villages, croplands, orchards, gardens, date palms, and other items that are endowed by the deceased Sultan Suleiman Khan (may his earth be pleasant) within the towns of Imam Ali, of Imam Husayn, the townships of Hilla, Mahrud, Mandanjin, Shahriban, Had, and their subordinated units, had previously been surveyed and worked into the register in the year of nine hundred eighty-three, but since that time until now, have not been surveyed [anew]. Some persons turned most parcels of the Endowment into their private property and made these [parcels] required [to be bestowed] upon their selves, saying "these are made required for us" whereas this is not in the old survey registers, and thus seized and held [these alienated properties] against the register and contrary to the conditions of the endower. The illustrious Endowment altogether suffered, while many of its parts became concealed, disrupted, and upset. [Yusuf Agha] reported thus, and requested that an emphatic illustrious Order of high glory addressed to the revered vizier his Excellency guarding Baghdad and the great-judge Efendi of Baghdad be given; that the villages, croplands, orchards, gardens, date palms, shops, dye-works, butcheries, weigh-house, spinners' market, bathhouse, state as well as private assets, which in accordance with the old survey register belong to the Endowments of Imam Ali and Imam Husayn and Imam Abbas their Holiness and are located within the borders of the towns of Imam Ali, Imam Husayn, the townships of Hilla, Mahrud, Mandaljin, Shahriban, Had, Kebçe, and their subordinated units, as well as the soup-kitchens, roofed [buildings], and whatever greater and lesser innovated within the borders of the Endowment after the [original] survey, be surveyed [anew] and worked into the registers; that nothing big or small from the croplands, orchards, date palms, soup-kitchens, and roofed buildings of the aforesaid Endowment be hidden or remain unregistered; that all these be surveyed well and worked into the registers; that Mehmed Kalfa a senior clerk of the Accountancy of the Sanctuaries of Mecca-Medina be appointed as surveyor and Mehmed from among the Gatekeepers of the Sublime Court as commissary; that the aforesaid Endowment be surveyed and registered with full discipline and care by means of these two and Ali Agha the trustee of the Endowment; that no nonaffiliated person infringe, forestall, or harass their surveying; and that a good orderliness be instituted. In accordance with the submission by the Endowment's overseer and the issued Sublime Decree saying "a decree shall be accordingly given," an illustrious Order was given on 10 March 1686 that it be surveyed anew as explained.

1 November 1686

This too is found to be written [in the logs].

[iv.6 finance minister's sixth notification: quoting from a third archived notification]

The survey register of the aforesaid surveyor came in, and became processed. It has been recorded into the State Registry. In accordance with the sublime Decree dated with the year of ten ninety-nine, it is being kept at the Accountancy of the Sanctuaries of Mecca-Medina for its sealed copy to be taken as authoritative.

Whereas the aforesaid Ali held the aforesaid trusteeship up until the year of eleven hundred and two, in the aforesaid year he was removed and it was conferred upon somebody else. Since that date, it has been conferred by the Endowment's overseer upon one other person each year. To hold it from the beginning of March of eleven twenty-six onwards, it has been conferred upon the person named Haji Hasan with a sublime Decree in accordance with the submission by blissful Mehmed Agha the current overseer of the Endowment and the chief eunuch of the Imperial Harem.

Thus is written and recorded in the [chancery logs of the] Accountancy of the Sanctuaries of Mecca-Medina.

Submission by this servitor of Yours is as follows.

As declared in this register: some tax-farms of the Endowments of the Two Illustrious Martyria are leased out with deductions because of the decline in visitors from Iran. Its capital stock and its current deduction are exactly written out. With the grain prices of the mentioned year, it has in total sixteen thousand, nine hundred and thirty two and a half and a quarter thalers of income, and sixteen thousand, seven hundred and ten thalers of expenditure. After the mentioned expenditure is subtracted from the specified income, the net remainder of two-hundred twenty-two and a half and a quarter thalers are in the coffers, and the mentioned amount is dispatched. It is requested that upon its arrival, it be received, this very register be logged into its place, and a receipt copy be bestowed upon this servitor of Yours as voucher. In that regard, order and decree is of the Just Court. Written on 10 J[anuary] 1723

Document 21 (Münşeat-ı Nazmizâde Murtazâ, 38b-39b)

Type: letter, in fragment and verbatim copy, from the Ottoman governor of Baghdad to the grand vizier of Safavid Iran

... the eminent, highly-glorious xan of elevated dignity, ... trust of the Iranian state! After presenting to Your lofty assembly ... honest and meaningful prayers, ... which boost the council of friendship and fellowship, what the pen depicts is as follows. This year, ... Beyg, the model of his equals and peers, became appointed the pilgrimage commander for the service of facilitating the inbound and outbound journeys as well as the protection ... of the salvation-bound pilgrims, who intend to go on the pilgrimage to the Forbidden House of God and visit the Garden of the Master of all creation ... over the Baghdad road ... and who depart for this righteous path. [This] letter is penned ... for the permit to be given to the joyful pilgrims from ... Iran, who mean to circumambulate the Ancient House and intend to visit the Garden ... this year, and for the cropland of the hopes of the Muslims to be soaked and refreshed by Your clouds of generosity. When, God-willing, [this letter] attains the honor to be read by You, it is expected that You ... please to not spare Your sympathy ... from the afore-said servant of Yours and that You please to spend all efforts and take good, comprehensive care to send off the ... pilgrims with complete hopes, caressing, ... and utmost encouragement. It is not a secret ... that the expenditure of Your dear attention in this regard will bring about good renown [for You]. God willing, it is for sure that I the well-wisher of Yours will also expend all care ... and attention ... to support and uphold them ... in every way. Aside from these [matters], it is free from any doubt that opening the highway of pilgrims and visitors and preparing the tools to obtain the expectations of the Muslims [will] stir the chain of affection, cause the reinforcement of the firm peace, ... and occasion the welfare of all mankind ...

Handwritten musical notation on a page, featuring multiple staves with notes, rests, and lyrics in Turkish. The notation includes various musical symbols such as clefs, time signatures, and accidentals. The lyrics are written in a cursive script below the staves. The page is numbered 1030 in the top left corner and GÜNGÖRÜRLER in the top right corner. The notation is organized into several systems, with some staves containing multiple lines of music and lyrics. The overall style is characteristic of traditional Turkish musical notation.
