Open Access 2.0

This past year has been a momentous one for the Journal of Greek Linguistics. As we reported in our last editorial, in JGL 16.1, we have moved to being an open access journal. Since “open access” is still somewhat new for many of us in academia, we reiterate here what this move means both for the journal and for authors:

- Article Processing Charges (APCs) will apply to all articles submitted from now on that are accepted for publication.
- APCs will be kept at a very low rate (c. 500 Euros) for the first couple of years, and will be covered by the authors or their funding bodies (their Universities, Research Councils, etc.). For authors who are not in a position to cover the APCs, special arrangements can be made, at the discretion of Brill.
- The entire journal will be available in Open Access to any interested party, and this includes all back issues.

We have already begun, with submissions this year, to apply this model, and so far it has been running smoothly.

The goal of moving to open access is to allow for greater dissemination of the research that our articles present and discuss since they are now available to anyone with access to the internet. It is admittedly a different model from the subscription-based model that has been in effect for most journals for decades, but it seems to represent the future of academic publishing and thus was a model that we needed to take seriously. It may be an unfamiliar practice to scholars in the Humanities to have to secure funding to publish their work, but at this stage, quite a few institutions and funding agencies already have policies in place to cover APCs and we need to learn to take advantage of such opportunities.

More information on this can be found on the journals webpage at brill.com/jgl and the specifics of Brill's version of open access can be found at brill.com/brilopen.

As we continue to move in this brave new world of open access, we want to reiterate our assurance to our readers that nothing about our basic mission has changed: our goals are, as before and as always, to publish the very best scholarship on the Greek language and make this scholarship accessible to the widest audience possible.

We would appreciate any feedback from you, our readers and users, on this move.
